

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

DEDICATION.

Angus to Her Soldier Sons.

♫ you, my gallant Sons who have served your Queen and Country in South Africa, in pride and love I dedicate this volume. More precious than the spoils of war devoted to the service of the Lord when kings went forth to battle long ago, are the offerings of flesh and blood which I have given in you, my valiant children. Lamenting that the cause of liberty and justice must thus be fought in your blood, I yet am proud that when the trumpet-call of Duty sounded, you answered with eagerness and joy. Yours it was not to ask the reason of the fray, but just to play the soldier's part, to do or die.

I am watching at the window with throbbing heart, and crying through the lattice—"Why are the chariots so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of the chariots?" But, considering how honour doth become you, and pleased that you seek danger where you are like to find fame, I say with Volumnia to every Virgilia who weeps at her sewing—"Had I a dozen sons, each in my love alike and none less dear than thine and my good Marcius, I had rather had eleven die nobly for their country than one voluptuously surfeit out of action."

If your heads may be covered by loving, watchful spirits coming from afar to brood and hover over them, there is none without his helmet in the battle hour. But shelter you do not ask who know that

"Cowards die many times before their death;
The valiant never taste of death but once."

I commend you to the care and keeping of Him who, marching to victory by paths which are wet with the blood of millions of His creatures, is yet quick to mark the sparrow's fall.

This Muster-Roll I lay at your feet; but when its letters are illegible and the occasion which gave it birth has been forgotten, your names will still be found upon that other and immortal Muster-Roll of noble hearts who have bled beneath the standard with motto, "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori."

P R E F A C E.

THE MUSTER-ROLL OF ANGUS" is the realisation of a patriotic idea which first discovered itself in the minds of Mrs Lindsay Carnegie of Spynie and Boysack, and Miss Jane C. C. Macdonald, Windmill House, Arbroath. Once discovered, the idea soon developed into a scheme for the publication of a volume in which might be preserved the names and portraits of Men of Angus who had fought in the South African War, or rendered other service at the Front during the conflict. The scheme was not inspired by any provincial egotism; the Promoters had no thought that the services of Men of Angus in the British Forces were more worthy of commemoration than those rendered by men of the Lothians or the Border. They desired simply to do for their own shire-family what they hoped would be done in other counties and communities throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies—each following its own plan in honouring its valiant sons.

The community of Angus greeted "The Muster-Roll" proposal with unanimity and enthusiasm. Amongst all classes the effort to record the names and commemorate the services of those who, in Angus's name, had answered the call for men to fight for Queen and country, had the heartiest approval. Sons and daughters of Angus, both at home and abroad, and many relatives and other friends along with them, were prompt, whole-hearted, and practical in their benediction; Angus became quick with the sense of kinship and approbation of her children's valour. With what intrepidity her sons have proved themselves worthy of commemoration many an honourable wound, and many a lonely grave, upon which, with silent eyes, the Southern stars look down, may tell. However imperfectly "The Muster-Roll" may fulfil its purpose, Angus has good reason to be proud of the memories the volume is intended to enshrine.

To sons and daughters of Angus upon whom has been bestowed the gift of expression in literature, music, or the graphic arts, of the patriotic feelings which have filled all British hearts concerning our soldiers during the progress of the war, an appeal was made for contributions to the volume. These, it was hoped, would be taken as giving expression to Angus's tribute to the brave sons whom she had given to aid the Empire in its hour of danger. The volume shows how cordial was the response to this appeal.

The thanks of the Promoters are, in the first place, due to H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, for graciously contributing the portrait of a Highlander of the old 93rd Regiment—now Princess Louise's Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders.

To Angus writers, artists, and composers—(their names will be found recorded elsewhere in the volume)—sincere thanks are due. Their generous enthusiasm so filled the sails of the Promoters' enterprise that from the hour of leaving port a safe and happy voyage-end was assured.

Mr Henry T. Wyse, art master, Arbroath High School, supervised, with characteristic care and good taste, the decorative work in the portrait pages of the volume. The cover of the volume was designed by Mr Wyse, and, with one exception, the decorative designs and borders are Mr Wyse's own or his pupils' work. Misses J. K. Chapel (pp 96 and 146), Helen Chapel (pp 151 and 154), J. A. Bisset (p 142), Marguerite R. Bennet (p 152), Ida Leslie (p 153); Messrs P. K. Hanton (p 141), Charles Fowler (p 149), Albert Bisset (p 150), Roy Leslie (p 155), and Charles Paterson (p 158)—all pupils of Mr Wyse—and Miss C. E. Dickson (p 144) contributed decorative borders. The Promoters desire to have recorded here their thanks to all these artists, and also their great indebtedness to Mr Wyse for service at once distinguished in its artistic excellence, and most generous in its extent, patience, and kindness.

To the Dowager-Countess of Airlie for liberty to reproduce a crayon sketch of her son, Captain the Hon. Lyulph Ogilvy; to the Earl of Southesk who generously permitted and bore the expense of the reproduction of Jameson's portrait of the Marquis of Montrose; to the Countess of Strathmore who graciously provided a photograph of the fine portrait of Claverhouse in Glamis Castle; and to Mr Low, Montrose, for an excellent water-colour drawing of the Colours of the Angus Fencibles, thanks are also due.

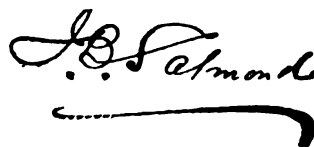

The collection of the portraits and information regarding Angus soldiers included in "The Muster-Roll" would have been impossible without the aid of friends. Colonel William Smith, V.D., J.P., Dundee, with characteristic tact and generosity, looked after Dundee and district. He took great pains to make the Dundee list as complete as possible; and he gathered names of soldiers and subscribers with zeal which made him an invaluable "recruiting officer." To him and to his daughter, Miss Smith, Secretary of the Dundee Branch of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association, "The Muster-Roll" is greatly indebted. Mr Geo. S. Nicolson, of the Forfar Herald; Mr James Balfour, of the Montrose Standard; Mr D. S. Edwards, of the Brechin Advertiser, along with his son, Mr David Edwards, and Sergeant-Instructor Brown, Brechin; Rev. Mr Troup, Broughty Ferry; Mrs G. W. Baxter, Ashcliff, Dundee; Mrs Wilkie, Ardmore, Kirriemuir; and Lieutenant D. W. Fairweather, Arbroath—all these friends gave most valuable aid in the ingathering of information and portraits.

In nearly every case the portraits of Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers, and Rank and File have been provided by the nearest relatives of the soldiers, with authority for their publication. In all cases where application has been made to photographers, copies of portraits and permission to reproduce them have been generously given. The thanks of the Promoters are specially due to Messrs Valentine, Watt & Son, and Robertson, Dundee; Messrs W. H. Geddes & Son and Mr and Mrs Anckorn, Arbroath; Mr John Carr, Montrose; Mr W. Mayor, Forfar; the London Stereoscopic Company (for portrait of H. H. Prince Christian Victor); Mr C. E. Corke, Sevenoaks, London; and to the proprietors of the Pall Mall Magazine, Black and White, the Illustrated London News, the Lady's Pictorial, and the Piper of Dundee. In the case of a large number of soldiers no portrait was obtainable. In justice to the photo-etchers and the printers it may also be mentioned that a great many of the photographs were so decayed and faulty that the reproduction of a good portrait from them was an impossibility.

In acknowledging the multitudinous kindnesses which have attended the promotion of the volume, the services of some generous friends may have been overlooked. To all who have in any way assisted, the Promoters desire that their sincere thanks should be communicated.

The liberality of a number of friends interested in "The Muster-Roll" has enabled the Promoters to provide a copy for the home of every Angus soldier mentioned in the volume. This is a result of their labours which has brought to the Promoters exceeding pleasure. Their supreme hope is that in the homes of Angus soldiers "The Muster-Roll" may keep alive many brave memories, and nourish the valorous love of home and kindred which is one of the best guarantees of freedom, strength, and unity throughout our Queen's vast dominions.

In the discharge of his duties the Editor has been aided liberally by many artists, journalists, and other friends. For them he must make one more call upon the "exchequer of the poor" and send them "evermore thanks."

PROMOTERS' NOTE.

BESIDES all his editorial duties, Mr Salmond kindly undertook to express the thanks of the Promoters to all those who, in varying degrees, have assisted to make "The Muster-Roll of Angus" a success. Of his own services, however, it has naturally been impossible for Mr Salmond to speak, although it is mainly to these services that the success of "The Muster-Roll" is due. From the moment that the idea of "The Muster-Roll" was conceived, until the completion of the volume, Mr Salmond, with patriotic ardour and unwearying assiduity, worked to bring the book into its present form; and the Promoters are well aware that the number and value of the artistic and literary contributions contained in its pages are in no small measure due to his personal influence.

A good cause is always safe in Mr Salmond's hands, and all who see "The Muster-Roll" will assuredly recognise the ability and zeal with which he has rounded off and finished up the book which he so generously undertook to edit. For the sake of those men who went forth to represent Angus in South Africa, and of those at home who watch and wait to do them honour, Mr Salmond willingly and ungrudgingly gave unnumbered days of anxious thought and of unremitting toil. No words are strong enough to express our personal indebtedness for his services; but it is to the gratitude of all who claim kinship with Angus, and are in sympathy with the spirit of "The Muster-Roll" that we would commend our Editor.

July, 1900.

Since the above lines were penned, he on whose behalf they were written has, alas! passed beyond the reach of our commendation. Amongst the many memories which surround the making of this book, amongst the many gallant deeds therein recorded, the patient, quiet labour with brain and pen was in itself as fine an effort, as brave a fight as some of those fought in South Africa. Disinterested work such as his deserves the recompense of an enduring remembrance, and this it will assuredly receive from all who knew our late Editor.

August, 1901.

SECOND EDITION.

PROMOTERS' NOTE.

THE Second Edition of "The Muster-Roll" was originally prepared to meet the large demand for copies after the First Edition was exhausted. We considered it advisable, however, not to publish it immediately, but to wait until the close of the War. By doing so, we were enabled to complete the Roll by not merely repairing any inadvertent omissions, but by adding to it the names of men who served only in the latter part of the campaign. Over 1300 names have now been added.

No pains have been spared in the endeavour to make the lists full and accurate, but in a number of cases it has been found impossible to trace the soldiers, and to obtain correct information about their services and medals. In other cases, also, the medals to which they are entitled have not yet been awarded.

We desire to take this opportunity of expressing our indebtedness to Mr Brodie for his assistance. After the lamented death of his partner, Mr Salmond, Mr Brodie very kindly undertook the onerous duties of Editor, and he has devoted much time and labour to the completion of the task. To Miss J. K. Chapel, Miss Helen Chapel, and Mr R. M. Sim, who gave designs; to the Officers of the various Regiments—too numerous to mention individually—who furnished information from the military records; and to many friends who assisted in different ways, we wish to express our gratitude in a single word of thanks.

MUSTER-ROLL OF ANGUS.

CONTRIBUTIONS BY AUTHORS AND ARTISTS.

THE MUSTER-ROLL OF ANGUS.

A GREEK SOLDIER'S GRAVE.

BY A. S. MURRAY, LL.D., F.S.A., British Museum.

From an Athenian Vase in the British Museum—About 450 B.C.

THE ÆTHER RECEIVED THEIR SOULS, EARTH THEIR BODIES. . . . THEY PUT THEIR LIVES IN THE BALANCE AGAINST THEIR COUNTRY'S GLORY —Epitaph on the Athenians who fell at Potidæa, B.C. 432 (in the British Museum).

THE old Greeks were continually fighting ; their poets and historians found inspiration in the theme of war. In their art there is more of deadly conflict than of anything else. Their artists, when they chose, could represent a battle-scene as full of horror and confusion as the most modern picture. Witness the fine mosaic of Pompeii in the museum of Naples, where the army of Alexander the Great crashes into the ranks of the Persian King, Darius. The strange thing is that the artists seldom chose this realistic line. Indeed, they went on painting and sculpturing with unrivalled genius vast groups of gods fighting with giants, or Greeks against Trojans, finding in these mythical or legendary scenes of times long past, subjects in which they might well be excused for not introducing the harrowing details of actual war, for the good reason that no details were to be had. Many of the best of the Greek works of art are of this kind, and as a rule they are now regarded with indifference, so far as their meaning is concerned, or the story they tell, while the artistically far inferior battle-scene of Alexander against Darius strikes the spectator with horror.

Yet it was not from indifference that the greatest of the Greek artists chose to avoid the confusion and turmoil which they knew to be incidental to actual war. Had that been their spirit the public would have resented it soon enough. Nor was it from want of skill. The explanation must be sought elsewhere; and possibly the drawing here given from one of our vases may help us. A young man has fallen in war, and, like so many others, then as now, was buried on the field of battle. His friends at home needed no picture of the dreadful reality to deepen their grief. They would rather listen to some great orator like Pericles, who would tell them how "the whole country was the grave of those who fell in war." There was no consolation for them in art, except by the means of imagery, such as that of our vase, where the two winged gods, Death and Sleep, carry the young man's body away to his home, and lower it beside an imaginery tomb prepared for him. The painter knew how Homer had described Death and Sleep carrying off the body of Sarpedon from the field of Troy to his home in Lycia to be buried in a grave, with a tombstone over him, "for such is the guerdon of those who die;" and we in our time find almost the same imagery in the famous words of John Bright during the Crimean War:—"The angel of Death has been abroad throughout the land; you may almost hear the beating of his wings." Let us therefore, in remembering the dead who have fallen in this war, think of them in the kindly Greek manner as being carried to their long home by winged beings as in our picture—Death, grim and bearded with streaming hair; Sleep, youthful and gentle.

In our calamities of war we look to our religion for consolation, and doubtless the Greeks did the same in a less degree. But they were far more dependent on their poets and artists than we are for the interpretation of the mysteries of life and death. They did not want from their artists accurate pictures of what took place—the barest description was enough for that. What they longed for was that their emotions—saddened as they were by the actual facts of war—should be raised to a higher level by means of imagery. To my mind, it was that deep and ever true impulse of the human heart which led the Greeks to seek consolation in times of war from the old myths and legends.

Once the idea of winged beings carrying off the dead from the battlefield had taken firm hold of the Greek imagination, it was easy for poets to vary it, and to invent a new legend, in which, instead of Death and Sleep, we have Boreas, the blustering North Wind, and Zephyros, the soft West Wind, carrying the body of Memnon from the plain of Troy, where he fell, to his distant home in Central Africa. In early Christian art under the Roman Empire, the old Greek idea is again modified, and takes the form of two angels, bearing the body of an Emperor to the skies to be received by a divine assembly waiting for him. That is what we see on an ivory diptych in the British Museum of the year 476 A.D. The two angels are clearly our old friends, Death and Sleep.

Another idea of the Greeks was: Charon in his boat waiting among the reeds of Acheron to ferry the shades of the departed to the farther shore. In a picture by the greatest of the fresco-painters, Charon was figured as an old man at the oars, the water muddy, and the fish in it more like shadows than alive; and doubtless this was a source of inspiration to the minor artists whose occupation it was to paint vases for the dead, to be placed in the tombs. But on one of the paintings of this kind which we possess in the British Museum, the aged ferryman is standing in the stern of the boat and beckoning to a girl, who seems to hesitate, beside the reeds. It is only seldom that we find a scene of actual sorrow, such as the anguish of a mother over her dead child. Yet, to our notions, pictures of that nature would perhaps have been more appropriate on vases intended to be placed in or on tombs.

Here and there among the remains of Greek sculpture of the best age we find a monument in honour of someone who had fallen in battle, representing him engaged in combat. An instance familiar to those who have visited Athens is a tombstone still standing in the ancient cemetery in memory of a young man who had been slain in a cavalry charge at Corinth, B.C. 494. He is figured in the act of striking down one of the enemy. It is only from the inscription that we learn of his own death during the engagement. How he fell was doubtless well known to his relatives. But that is not indicated in any way by the artist. Indeed, without the inscription no one would suppose the sculpture to be other than a legendary group, like so many of the battle-scenes which fortunately still survive from the great age of Greek art.

AS Murray

A HIGHLANDER. BY J. W. HERALD.

THE DYING SOLDIER.

BY THE EARL OF SOUTHESK, K.T.

A SOLDIER lay at the foot of a stone,
In a pitiful plight was he,
For a rifle bullet had found a bone,
And smashed the pan of his knee.

So there on the hard, rough ground he lay,
Nor stirred to better his ill,
For the enemy lurked not far away,
And their bullets kept him still.

Low down in a trench they crouched concealed;
For, although they had held their ground,
The murderous guns from our batteries pealed,
And shells came dropping round.

He lifted his head,—then bullets sped,
That ruffled his helmet's crown,
While some, from the rocks that around him spread,
Brought battered fragments down.

And one keen bullet went straight to its mark
Through his sound leg, barely seen;
So he drew himself close, and lay quiet and stark
In the bounds of his narrow screen.

From the rise of the morn till the sunset's hour
No help and no comfort came,
And the fangs of cramp, with a growing power,
Were gnawing his limbs and frame.

The morning's mist had been dank and chill;
But when sunshine burst the haze
It glowed like a furnace all over the hill,
And parched him in its blaze.

For a while he knew of nothing but pain,
Or, fainting, respite found;
Of a sudden his thoughts were his own again,
Though they whirled in a mazy round.

One laugh he laughed, and he moaned one moan,
Then quiet as death he lay,
And he thought that his body was turning to stone,—
And then he tried to pray.

“Have mercy, O Lord!”—He could thus begin,
But no words beyond these would come;
For so long had he revelled in reckless sin
That his inner soul was dumb.

Again he tried, and again and again;
Then he raved in dark despair,
“Lost, lost for ever: my prayers are vain,
God has no heart to care.”

The sun went away, and down dropped night,
And nought could be seen or heard,
Save where distant camp-fires shed their light,
And where wounded groaned or stirred;

Or when ghostly grey figures, slim as breath,
Crept round in a corpse-light clear—
The spirits of some who had fallen in death,
Whose bodies were scattered near.

But the wounded man was so crushed by pain
That his soul had no room for dread;
Though thoughts without number revolved in his brain
All else was torpid and dead.

Then again once more he betook him to prayer.
Though he found not the ease he sought
He was raised from the dungeon of blank despair,
And he talked with himself in thought.

“I’m an outcast,” thought he, “as I know full well,
With no hold on a life-giving faith;
I was born to the world an apprentice of hell,
Under bond to the devil and death.

"How oft said my father—'This Scripture is true—
Until saving faith comes in,
There is nothing, my lad, we can purpose or do
That is not tainted with sin.

"'A man may strive proudly to merit God's love,
And be honest and rightly behaved ;
But unless, through free grace, he is born from above,
He has not a chance to be saved.'

"Then it's useless to try, and a trouble to sham,
Said I—and I went to the bad.
Oh! to think what I might be, and know what I am—
This thinking is driving me mad!

"And now in the darkness I linger in pain,
And I live with my thoughts alone ;—
Yet not quite lonely, for now and again
I can hear the wounded groan.

"But oh! to be home—and to breathe once more
Sweet airs from the heather in blow,
And to see the old manse, and the yews at the door,
And the glint of the river below ;

"And the pleasant fir woods on the banks above,
Where the yellow broom grows high ;
Where I met with my lass and we plighted our love—
Alas, what a traitor was I !

"Could she look on me now, she would come to my side,
And her gentle tears would fall.
Would she think of her wrongs, or remember her pride?
She would pity, and pardon me all.

"O mother, O mother, my heart is sore.
What worlds would I give but to know
I should see you again, and should listen once more
To your voice so soft and low.

"What though my life be evil and black,
Though all should banish your child,
You never would drive your darling back—
Blest mother, sweet and mild!

"But, what of my father, that stern old man—
Could I dare to brave his sight?
In the pulpit how harshly I've heard him ban
Bold haters of God's light,

"And have seen the hard smile that his features wore
When he mocked mere fools that sin.
Grim as he is, if I stood at the door
I know he would let me in.

"He would mutter a text from the 'Prodigal Son,'
To repress the kind words from his heart;
He would not embrace me, whatever was done,
But he would not say—'Depart.'

"And sweet mother—how well I can picture her face,
Her tears of compassion and love.
Oh, why on this earth should we meet with such grace,
And with nought but damnation above!"

He sighed. Then a voice in his soul did say—
'Should your father be deaf to your prayer,
If, wasted and weary, you sought him some day,
And prayed for forgiveness and care;

'Should your mother but turn from you, bitter and dry,
As you there imploring her stood,—
Would men, would the angels, would God on high Declare such dealings good?'

"Good?—Yes, very good—on the devil's plan;
But would Christians reckon it right
If you drove from your door a poor penitent man
To perish in the night?

"And if wrought by a father to ruin his son,
What a hateful deed it would be."
Then a light through his spirit appeared to run—
"I was blind—now I see, I see!

"Oh, how could I think that God most great,
Whom the heights and the depths obey,
Is less good than the men that His hands create,
Frail creatures of a day!"

And at once he saw, as the truest of things—
Deny it those who would—
That the God from whose being all goodness springs
Must be Himself all-good.

Then over his soul came a calm so deep
Then he ceased to remember his pain,
In the arms of the angels he seemed to sleep,
And in quiet bliss remain.

And, as if in a dream, to himself he said—
“Oh, thus 'twould be sweet to stay ;
But, as soon as my body is cold and dead,
They will bear my soul away.

“They will bear me to realms where all is bright,
Far over the arch of the sky,
And set me in face of the throne of light
Where God doth reign on high.

“I will stand like a man, in that radiance clear,
As a Scottish soldier should ;
Not crouch like a coward—I never must fear,
For I know that God is good.

“I will say to the Lord—for His might is so great
He will pity my might so small—
‘Have mercy, O Lord, when Thou fixest my state,
As Thou art Father of all.

“O, Father, most holy, though still Thy son,
It is meet that I now should go,
For evil wrought and for good undone,
To anguish, toils, and woe.

“‘But I ask Thee—I ask in that Saviour’s name
Who on man’s earth has stood,
Who bore, for love of us, pain and shame,
And taught us Thou art good—

“‘Consign me not to an evil place,
To dwell with Thine outcast foes,—
I ask it, Lord, from Thy boundless grace—
Let me not dwell with those.

“Grant me some place, where, through my pains,
I may learn to serve Thee well—
Far, far from heaven, where glory reigns,
But far, O Lord, from hell.

“I could not live where the angels stay,
For my soul is black and scored;
But I hate the fiends that have wrecked my way,
And Thee I love, O Lord.”

Cold, cold was the night, and, as hours went on,
The fires of his life burnt low;
His heart ceased beating, all sense was gone,
His soul was free to go.

No more could he think about earthly things,
But his spirit still could pray.
Then angels sought him, on gentle wings,
And led his soul away.

Bright rises morn, and the voices of war
Break loud on the mountain's marge,
The rifles rattle, the cannon roar,
The Gordons head the charge.

With steel they carried that trench on the hill;
And, in searching the front of the place,
They came on their comrade, pale, rigid, and chill,
God's sunshine on his face.

THE GALLANT GORDONS.

FORTH to the front the Gordons go,
Filled with joy, to seek the foe;
Marching lightly on with gay and easy swing,
While the pibrochs float above their van like eagles on the wing.

On to the hill the Gordons go,
Fired with joy, to find the foe ;
Up through the rocks, nor stop to draw a breath,
Though the bullets yell around their heads and strew the ground with death.

Into the trench the Gordons go,
Mad with joy, to meet the foe ;
Drive them out with steel, and smash them hand to hand—
'Tis the only trick the treacherous knaves can never understand.

'Bydand, bydand,' the Gordons stay,
To hold the hill at the close of day.
Many have been wounded, and many have been slain,
But their glory shall be 'bydand' bright, while Scotland
doth remain.

Note.—'Bydand'—the Gordon motto—is the old Scottish form of the word
Biding—waiting, abiding, enduring.

LETTER FROM RIGHT HON. JOHN MORLEY, M.P.

57 ELM PARK GARDENS,
SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.

Feb. 6. 1900.

Dear Mr. Salmond, "

I sincerely hope the "Muster-Roll of Angus" will be as successful as its purpose deserves. Whatever view may be taken of the policy of the war, it is impossible to think of the men to whom the volume is intended to be a tribute, without admiration for their intrepidity and valour, and pity for the hearts and the homes to which the scourge of war has been desolating.

Yours most truly,
John Morley.

DAWN AFTER THE BATTLE — THE ROLL - CALL BY MAX COWPER

SOLDIER AND STOIC.

BY R. NEISH.

THERE was a curious contrast between those who were leaving and those who were left.

The soldiers were in great spirits, their hearts beating high with hope and anticipation; but the women, although they made valiant efforts to appear gay and cheery, had some difficulty, now that the moment of parting had actually come, in keeping back their tears. Even the men's faces grew momentarily grave and anxious as they exchanged a last greeting, or murmured a farewell word; but they soon grew cheerful and eager again, and it seemed as though all the bitterness of the sorrow fell, as it ever does, on those who were left.

There was, however, one striking exception to this rule, for an old General stood positively beaming, as he bade a last good-bye to his only son. "You're in luck's way, my boy," he said heartily, "in luck's way; and I only wish I were going with you."

"I wish you were, sir," replied his son as heartily. "Remember me to all the boys at Redford when you go north to Angus. Tell them I'll be back hale and hearty for the Twelfth! Good-bye, dad!"

"Right you are—good-bye and good luck to you," called the General; and with another warm hand-clasp—a little closer perhaps this time—they separated.

A few hours later the stately transport, the "Bristol Castle," was slowly gliding seawards, and General Ogilvy was speeding back to town.

He sat in a corner of the railway carriage, staring aimlessly out of the window, his eyes still soft with love and pride, but his lips set in a grim determination to suppress a strange sinking at his heart.

A melancholy-faced man, seated opposite to him, leant forward and said deferentially to the old soldier—"It is a sad thing to lose one's son, sir."

He spoke with a deprecating smile, for the General did not look either genial or inclined to talk.

"Lose him—why should you lose him?" asked General Ogilvy, turning irately towards him.

"One never knows," answered the melancholy man; "and one instinctively fears the worst in these days."

"I don't know why one should fear the worst in these days more than in any other days," said the General, stiffly.

"He is my only son," replied his companion, slowly.

"My only son has gone too, sir," said the General, almost fiercely, "and my only regret is that I haven't half-a-dozen of 'em to send." Here he glanced half-contemptuously at the melancholy-faced man. "And as to snivelling about it, why, d—n it, sir, we'll leave that to the women."

"Ah! my dear sir; you take a soldier's view. I am not a soldier, and I cannot lay claim to the qualities of the stoic. I am only a lonely, idle man, and my son is everything to me."

"Is he?" replied the General unsympathetically. "Well, I'm happy to say that my son is everything to his Queen and to his country."

General Ogilvy had left his club, and was being driven rapidly down Piccadilly homewards, when suddenly the hoarse cry of the newspaper-vendor resounded on every side of him. "H'orful disaster to the British—great slaughter—eleven guns lost—great disaster!"

The General set his mouth grimly, and put his cane up through the little door. "Paper," he said, laconically; and the driver pulled up with a jerk at the corner of the street. "Here you are, sir; H'Echo, Sun, Evening News, Star, sir?"

"Anything you like, confound you," said the General; and snatching the first paper handy, threw the boy a shilling. He opened the Evening News with a hand that shook in spite of his stern self-control, and looked eagerly down the list of killed and wounded. Seeing him so absorbed, the newspaper boy, taking his chance, looked up at the driver and said with ready wit "Right you are, cabby," and turned to secure another customer.

The cabman drove on, and the General continued to pore over his paper. "Not even a scratch," he muttered at last, and breathed more freely; and then, with sudden recollection, put his cane through the little door again,

"Here, where the devil are you driving to?" he spluttered angrily. "Where's my change?"

The cabman, aghast at having been so easily taken in, rapidly pursued the small boy, and came up to him as he was demanding twopence from a luckless old lady for a half-penny paper.

"Here, you scoundrel," cried the General angrily, "where's my change? I've a good mind to give you in charge."

"Beg parding, sir. It was the cabby's fault, sir. Tried to foller you, sir; but couldn't catch him up. Thank you, sir;" and the boy ruefully handed up his ill-gotten gains.

The cabman dropped a volley of curses, and raised his whip threateningly, but the boy ran off. "A head for emergencies, that boy; he'd make a good soldier," muttered the General, and became absorbed in his paper again.

A month later, General Ogilvy sat in his study, grim and defiant, grimly facing life and possible disappointment, and defying a curious instinct of coming sorrow. As he sat there, a man calling lustily in the street below, paused under his window. "Great—British—Victory! Capture of the——" A passing vehicle drowned the last sentence. "Great British Victory—3 Officers wounded.—Casualty List—Death of Major Ogilvy—Great British Victory!" The General sat rigidly grasping the arm of his chair. Perhaps, perhaps, he had not caught the name correctly; besides there might easily be two or even three Ogilvys. He would have rung the bell, but a sharp pain in his side that had greatly troubled him lately prevented his moving. Suddenly the door opened, and the old housekeeper, who had been with him for many years, stumbled rather than walked into the room.

"Sir," she stammered piteously, "the Major—Master Jack!" and the paper dropped from her trembling hand to the General's feet.

On the following morning General Ogilvy came slowly downstairs. The pain in his side had been insistent during the whole of the long night, and his step tottered slightly as he crossed the hall. He opened the library door and steadied himself for a moment against a chair—his son's favourite arm-chair. The blinds were down, and the room was dimly lit by one electric light. He looked vaguely round, and then, pulling himself together, rang the bell sharply.

The butler came in and stood waiting in the doorway. "Who pulled these blinds down?" asked the General, pointing towards the window as he spoke.

The man stared at him.

"Why don't you answer?" he asked, angrily. "Who put these blinds down, and what for—eh?"

The man looked at him in amazement, not unmixed with anxiety. "Sir, the—the Major!" he stammered and became abruptly silent. He could not conceive that his master had forgotten his son's death. Surely the trouble had unhinged his mind, he thought; and took a hasty step forward.

"Well, and what of the Major?" said the General drawing himself stiffly erect, and only laying his hand involuntarily on his left side for a moment as he did so. "What of the Major, Barnes? Do you think we are going to mourn for him? Hasn't he died a glorious death, and aren't we proud of him—eh? Haven't we heard him say a hundred times, when he fired his little gun in the woods at Redford, and drilled the gardener's children on the lawn, that he would be a brave soldier—eh? Wasn't he a brave boy, Barnes? and hasn't he died as a brave man—worthy of Angus and of the Ogilvys—eh? We are proud—proud, I tell you. You can go and pull up the blinds everywhere, for there shall be no whining in this house—go, go——" He moved his hand peremptorily. The man hurriedly withdrew, and had barely left the room before General Ogilvy sank with a wholly irrepressible moan of pain into his son's favourite chair.

"Great British Victory—List of yesterday's casualties—Great Victory——"
The hoarse cries rang up and down the long empty street, for it was late in the evening.

"He's been looking very queer all day," said the butler, as he stood for a moment in the doorway of the housekeeper's room; "and he hardly touched his dinner, although he took everything I offered him—for he's a 'ero, that's what he is; or, if he ain't, the Lord Almighty alone knows what a 'ero is."

"Go down and see if he wants anything now," said the housekeeper anxiously; "I don't like the look of him at all."

The butler went downstairs and softly opened the library door.

The General was sitting in his son's chair by the fire, and did not move as the man came in.

"Great British Victory—Great Bri—tish——"

"Is there anything I can get you before I lock up, sir?" It was an unusual request.

The General shook his head impatiently. "What is—it they—are—saying?" he asked, slowly, "I can't quite make out what they are saying."

The voices came nearer, rang out less huskily—Great British Victory! Great——"

"Ah, I hear now," muttered the General and smiled faintly. "Another victory isn't it, Barnes?"

The butler, alarmed at the ghastliness of his face, hurriedly crossed the room and bent over his chair.

"Sir," he cried, anxiously, "what is it? Are you feeling ill?"

He looked eagerly into the ashen, smiling face, and, bending closer, cried tremblingly, "What is it, sir—what is it?"

There was no answer!

NOTES.—1 The Southern Cross 2 The Brothock.

3 The Abbey of Aberbrothock was founded by King William the Lion in 1178. It was dedicated to the memory of Thomas à Becket.

4 The consecrated banner ('Breacbennach') of St Columba, which King William gave to the Abbey.

5 The men of the Abbey were marshalled under the banner of Columba at Bannockburn (1314), where their Abbot, Bernard de Linton, fought at the side of King Robert Bruce.

6 In April, 1320, the Scottish Parliament met at the Abbey of Aberbrothock, under the presidency of King Robert, and sent to Pope John XXII. the famous Declaration of Scottish Independence.

7 The houses which have done most to make the history of Angus are well represented at the war: among them are those of Ogilvy, Carnegie, Lindsay, Lyon, and Maule. 8 Ladysmith.

[TRANSLATION.]

ALL, great-hearted children of a glorious land, valiant offspring of valiant sires, a thousand sons, the pride of Angus, Mother of the Brave, who has sent you forth, steadfast of spirit, in the dread stress of war! Often has the North seen the high deeds of your fathers, in peace or on the stricken field: and now at the other Pole from the circling paths of the Bear, the Southern Cross beholds your deeds of prowess. Your ways are on the plains of Libya, and over her rugged hills, and by the banks of hostile rivers; ye shrink from no hardship, nor, if Heaven calls, from laying down your strong bright lives in the front of the battle.

But often, I ween, amidst the toils of warfare, or when the soldier has sunk to rest on Libyan soil, Memory brings to him, in the gentle promptings of dreams, a vision of his own Northern Land. He seems to look on the snow-mantled heights of the Grampians, or to move by the fair waters of the Brothock; where an Abbey, goal of many a vow, was founded of old by that King who bore the name and the heart of a Lion; and he dedicated the shrine to Thomas, who perished near the hallowed altar by the onset of an unholy band. And there he laid up a war-banner within the sanctuary, a mystic wonder for men who should come after, a relic of that holy man who lived in the shelter of sea-girt Iona, whose soothing spell was felt by all who dwelt around. That banner waved over the warriors of the Abbey when they conquered in the fight by the Bannock. And tell, O Muse, how the barons, the flower of Scottish chivalry, came together to that Abbey of yore, and their victorious King, presiding among his chieftains, sent a message on this wise to the Pontiff of Rome: “Know that Scotsmen will never yield, while breath is in them, to the behest of a foreign master. Not power, not wealth is dearest to brave men, but freedom, the crown of all that life can give.”

And now, it is in Freedom's cause, as Justice is our witness, that we are warring on the Libyan fields. Angus, thy renown shines anew, bright as of old: thy children have shown their mettle and their breed! Where is that house, among all thy noblest, that has not given its sons, kindlers of battle, to the ranks of our heroes—horse, or foot, or leaders of seamen—eager to do their duty by the land that bare them? Of whom some were within that famous town where brave succour came at last to brave defence.

Naiads who haunt the fountains of Angus,—for ye, O nymphs, are not forgetful of the past,—is there another sound in the whispering of the waters, from which ye darkly learn the fate of mortals, creatures of a day,—is the voice of the streams changed in your ears from the time when they flowed by the paths of our fathers,—when Bannockburn saw Scotland's armed array close in battle with the host of England? No more is Britain rent in twain by strife: the dwellers on the Border live no more in fear of sleepless war. One love, one loyalty, one spontaneous ardour bids all to work for the common welfare of their country. So is it seen from North to South, in the East and in the West: the Mother-land is one in spirit with her sons beyond the seas; and, honoured as no other Lady upon the Earth, our Queen reigns in the hearts of all.

R. C. Jebb.

In Memoriam.

† UGELA and the Modder glide
Red with the heart blood of the brave,
And lonely veldt and rough hillside
Are marked with many a grave.
Our lads have fought as heroes fight,
And died as Scottish men should die,
Their slogan "Liberty and Right,"
Their hope and trust in Him on high.

The clash of steel, the cannon's boom,
The shrieks that speak of awful strife,
Fall on the hearts like sounds of doom,
Of maiden, mother, and of wife,
For peace their prayers ascend above—
Not for the peace of victory,
But for the abiding peace of love—
That Boer and Briton kin may be.

“DECEMBER, 1899.”

BY LADY ARABELLA ROMILLY.

WHEN the Angel of Death stands by me,
And asks me, “What have you done
In this life of labour and trial?”

I shall answer “I gave my son—
I gave my flesh to my country,
I gave myself to the foe;
For I gave the child born of me;
And do we not reap as we sow?”

My blood has sprinkled God's country—
God's country as much as this—
For in His eyes every country
And each mother's son is His.
And the wails of the desolate mothers
Rise to the foot of His Throne;
For to every mother, God knoweth,
Hers is an only son!

“THE BOYS OF THE OLD BRIGADE.”

THE ANGUS VOLUNTEERS OF THE NAPOLEONIC PERIOD.

BY J. M. M'BAIN, F.S.A. SCOT.

IN the brave old days when King Robert Bruce was making Scotland a nation, in no quarter of the country—as the records of those who answered his call to Bannockburn show—did he find more patriotic support than in Angus. Nor can it ever be forgotten that it was from the memorable Parliament which was held in 1320 in the Regality Chamber of Arbroath Abbey there went forth that famous Declaration of Independence, the reading of which, it was said, made Pope John XXII. tremble. Through the intervening years our Maules, Lindsays, Ogilvys, Carnegies, Ouchterlonys, Duncans, Lyons, and Raits, as well as the rank and file of our fighting men, have done deeds of daring on field and flood. The sons of Angus have shewn themselves as ready to-day as their sires were of old to lay down their lives in defence of the honour of our much-loved Empire.

The “Muster-Roll of Angus” carries the memory back to the stirring times when the aggressive wars of France which followed the Revolution of 1789, threatening the safety of Britain, made her look to her means of national defence. Then, as now, the spirit of patriotism—voiced in 1320 by the Warrior Abbot of Aberbrothock—which still burns in the bosom of the men of Angus, was manifested in the enthusiasm with which they responded to the call to arms. From every town, village, and district, and from every mansion house and farm-stead in the county, the men of Forfarshire gave ample proof of their loyalty to their King and their devotion to their country. The magistrates and prominent citizens in each of the burghs took the lead in organising and equipping corps of Volunteers, which were quickly formed into divisional regiments, and so were prepared to present a bold front to any foe who dared to plant his foot on British soil.

Dundee entered into the movement with that vigour which still characterises her citizens. From January, 1797, to July, 1805, the Town Council minutes bear ample evidence of the thoroughness with which that body, as representative of the community, took up the work of organisation. On 31st January, 1797, under the presidency of Provost Riddoch, the Council, after giving expression to their thorough appreciation of the important purposes to be served by the institution of a Corps of Volunteers, unanimously resolved to recommend to the inhabitants of Dundee in the strongest terms to join the Corps. And they further resolved "that the persons who have already entered, or may enter, with the Volunteers in this place, and who are not Freemen, shall be entitled to the freedom of the Burgh during their lives." Dundee was not alone in offering the freedom of the Burgh to the members of the Volunteer Corps; the Town Councils of Arbroath, Brechin, Montrose, and Forfar came to the same resolution; and in those days of close civic government this was no small honour. But not content with the formation of one Corps, the Town Council of Dundee, at a meeting held on the 11th March following, unanimously resolved to make offer to the Government to raise an additional Corps to be called "The Dundee Second Volunteer Corps;" this Corps to consist of three hundred men, to be divided into six companies, and to be commanded by officers to be recommended by the Magistrates and Town Council. Within six weeks thereafter the Provost was in a position to announce that His Majesty had been graciously pleased to accept of the six additional Volunteer Companies offered by the Council. The Council at once set to work to have the requisite number of men enrolled. In this they had considerable success, for the Committee appointed to carry out the Council's resolution was able within a fortnight to report that there had already been two hundred and fifty men enrolled. While the members of the Council were thus active in beating up recruits, they were equally willing to volunteer their own services, and so it came about that the bulk of the first officers of "the Second or Light Infantry Dundee Volunteer Corps"—as it was resolved to designate it—were drawn from amongst the Town Councillors of that time. The nominations made by the Council were submitted through the Lord Lieutenant of the County, and in due course the following officers of the Light Infantry Corps were gazetted, viz.:—Lieut.-Colonel A. Riddoch; Major Wm. Scott; Captains Thomas Webster, Alex. Balfour, J. Allison, J. Strachan, T. Webster, jr., and A. Peddie; Lieutenants John Guild, David Martin, James Edgar, John Crichton, Alex. Blyth, John Souter, William Small, Hen. Blyth, jr., and J. Webster, jr. The officers of the first-formed corps were—Lieut.-Colonel James Mylne; Major Robert Duff;

Captains Sir A. Douglas, Jas. Johnstone, Pat. Stirling, Thomas Bell ; Lieutenants Wm. Lindsay, Wm. Pitcairn, James Mitchell, Andrew M'Kenzie, Robert Stirling, Wm. Webster, David Brown, George Blair, and James Keith.

While townsmen of all ranks were willing to give their personal services, the Council were not niggardly with pecuniary help. At a meeting held in February, 1798, they resolved to subscribe £600—"towards the defence of our native country whose very existence as a nation is at present threatened by our determined and inveterate enemies." So the minute runs. Nor were the other towns in the County in loyalty a whit behind their bigger neighbour. While Dundee was busy enrolling members in its two corps, Arbroath was equally active in mustering her loyal sons. A large number of townsmen were speedily enrolled, the officers, as in the case of Dundee, being chiefly drawn from the Town Council. The Arbroath Companies were under command of Provost Balfour with the rank of Major, the other officers being Captains John Colvill, Charles Low, William Mill, and John Airth, with Lieutenants William Colville, Grant, Hennip, P. Sturrock, J. Lumgair, with John Nicoll as Adjutant. The Montrose Corps was under command of Lieutenant-Colonel A. Gardiner, with whom were Major A. Lyall, Captains Edward Green, A. Paterson, John Glegg, Lieutenants William Gibson, Alexander Scott, Alexander Thom, John Napier, Robert Webster, Andrew Millar, Robert Walker, and Charles Middleton. The Forfar Companies were officered by Captain William Don, Lieutenants William Adam, Robert Carrick, and Charles Webster, while Brechin had a similar corps under the command of Major Colin Gillies. These, so far as we can make out, were the officers of the Volunteer Corps of Angus as raised in 1797.

These Volunteer Corps, besides being furnished by the Government with clothing and arms, were also paid a shilling for each turn-out. As to their dress, their coats were scarlet, the cloth being of a rather finer texture than that of the soldiers of the line ; but for this quality they had to contribute a certain part of their pay. Their cross-belts were well pipe-clayed ; their head-gear being the same as that of the line. Their hair was powdered, and down behind hung queues rolled in ribbons of silk with a tuft at the termination.

After considerable negotiations the Peace of Amiens brought a truce to Volunteering ; but this was only for a very short time. In 1803 it became known that Napoleon Bonaparte had formed a design to invade Britain, and once again the call to arms resounded throughout the land, and was everywhere enthusiastically responded to. It was stated in Parliament on the 9th

December, 1803, that the Volunteer Force of Great Britain at that date numbered 379,943, while the force in Ireland numbered 70,000.

Again the men of Angus flocked to the standard. The Dundee Town Council, on the application of Colonel Riddoch and Colonel Mylne, agreed to pay each of them the sum of £50 in aid of their respective regiments, and at the same time the Magistrates showed their interest in the defensive operations by voting money for similar purposes. Bounties were provided by the Council to induce able-bodied seamen residing in or belonging to the town or parish of Dundee "to enter with Captain Laird, Regulating Officer at Dundee for His Majesty's sloop 'Minorca,' commanded by the Hon. Captain Henry Duncan, son of the late Viscount Duncan, or for any other ship to which Captain Duncan may be appointed."

Arbroath came forward with four companies of sixty men each, under the command of John Colvill, the Town Clerk, as Lieutenant-Colonel, and Provost Mill, banker, as Major. The Brechin men were commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Molison, the then Provost of the ancient city, and the Forfar contingent by Major Don.

While each corps was busily engaged with its own training, occasional joint drills were held for the practising of battalion movements. Now and then sham fights were engaged in. It may be interesting to recall one of these held at Arbroath, the combatants being the Forfar, Brechin, and Arbroath corps. Colonel Molison, of the Brechin contingent—who, in his younger days, had been a captain of the Royal Marines—having a fine military air, and being minus an arm lost in a duel, had a rather veteran-like appearance. The opposing forces met on the Arbroath Common. There was neither artillery nor cavalry on the ground. The Forfarians were the proud possessors of two howitzers, but they were either too lumbering to draw or too precious to be trusted so far from the county town. Skirmishing was kept up in vigorous style till the order was given for the Arbroathians to retreat, which, under cover of the Light Company, they did, taking up a position behind a low dyke which then separated the lands of Hospitalfield from the West Common. The Brechiners were ordered to charge, and Colonel Molison, proceeding in advance of his men to reconnoitre, peeped over the dyke, when he was greeted with the contents of an Arbroath musket, which fairly winged him, not of his other arm, but of the one side of his whiskers, thus constituting the only "casualty" of the day. Colonel Molison was grandfather of the late Major-General Smith, who resided for several years at Kelly Castle. Provost Molison afterwards held the post of Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant of the Forfarshire Militia. Indeed, many of the officers who commenced service in an Angus Volunteer regiment, afterwards had commissions in the local militia or in the Angus Fencibles.

While the duties were exacting and sometimes irksome to our civilian-soldiers, previously unaccustomed to the strict routine of a military life, that life was not altogether destitute of amusing incidents. Sir Walter Scott, in the "Antiquary," describes a false alarm at "Fairport," when the Volunteers are beat "to arms," and everything is bustle and excitement; when men of every rank, from the Earl of Glenallan to old Mucklebucket, are seen hurrying to and fro in active preparation to meet the coming enemy. The scene which Sir Walter so exquisitely conjures up was suggested by the following real incident in the experience of the Arbroath Volunteer corps. One evening after they had finished drill, and had been dismissed, some vessels were observed in the offing, which, seen through the fog, appeared to be of much larger dimensions than they were in reality. Taking advantage of this, the officers determined to try the mettle of their men. The drums beat to arms, and the bugles were heard in every street. In an incredibly short space of time the corps was under arms, ready to dare everything in defence of their King and country. The roll was called, and, with the exception of two, all the members of the corps responded to their names. But where were these craven loons? The one, who was a sort of limb of the law—a sheriff-officer or messenger-at-arms—had hid himself underneath his bed. A neighbour wife, whose guidman had gallantly "gone to the front," called on the "shirra officer's" better-half that they might condole with each other on the danger to which their two valiant spouses were at the moment believed to be exposing themselves. While wiping a tear out of her eye with the corner of her apron, she stumbled over the feet of the cowardly carle, who in his fright had forgotten to haul in his lubberly limbs. The other was a weaver in East Abbey Street, who, hearing the call to arms, threw his musket into a draw-well, took to his heels, and, making for the Magungie Woods, there remained till all danger was over. Meantime, the fog clearing away, "the enemy" was found to be two flax-laden vessels on their peaceful passage from Riga to Dundee, which had to wait in the offing till the clouds rolled by.

This was not the only incident in the history of the Angus Volunteers which furnished the novelist with material to "adorn a tale." "Delta," in his "Mansie Waugh," makes Mansie the hero of an amusing adventure. Here too the story, as Dr Moir tells it, is founded on fact, the incident having actually occurred in the case of a Brechin Volunteer while drilling on the Links at Montrose. Colonel Molison had noticed one of his men, Geordie D——, regularly obeying the word "load," but when this was followed by the order "fire" the trigger was never drawn. In this way eight charges found a lodging in the barrel of Geordie's gun. This was more than the Colonel could stand, so raising his voice he fiercely ordered the offender to discharge his musket. This Geordie tremblingly did, causing the barrel to burst, but happily with no worse result than the knocking down of the nervous Volunteer. The Colonel and the other officers rushed up to the fallen figure, expecting to find him mortally wounded, but Geordie, energetically waving his hand to prevent their approach, roared out: "Stand back, sirs, stand back; there's seven as gweed to come yet!"

Besides doing their usual drills, the Volunteers were called out for a continuous military exercise of twenty-one days. During this period they were generally marched to and stationed at some of the neighbouring towns. In Lamb's "Dundee: Its Quaint and Historic Buildings," under the subject "Dudhope Castle," is given a list of all the regiments that occupied it when used as barracks, and on two occasions the Forfarshire Volunteers are recorded as being quartered there:—"Forfarshire Volunteers, 4th Battalion (Dundee), 357 men; Lieutenant-Colonel Riddoch, Major Wm. Scott; entered quarters, 1804, February 22nd; left, 1804, April 25th." "Forfarshire Volunteers, 1st Battalion (Arbroath), 300 men; Lieutenant-Colonel John Colvill; entered quarters, 1804, April 25th; left, 1804, May 14th." To do their twenty-one days the Brechin men were quartered at Montrose, and it was on one of these occasions that the amusing incident just narrated occurred. The Forfar men were also sent to Montrose. The writer remembers asking an old Forfar Volunteer who was boasting about his soldering days whether he had ever seen foreign service, and got for answer—"Oo aye; I was ance at Ferryden!"

The Angus Fencibles, raised by, and under the command of, Major Fraser of Hospitalfield, and locally known as "Fraser's Men," were nearly all Angus men. The regiment comprised four or five companies, and was embodied in 1794-5. The minutes of the Arbroath Town Council, of date 6th August, 1794, bear that John Fraser, Esq., as Deputy-Lieutenant of the County of Forfar, waited on the Council and suggested the enrolment of the inhabitants for the defence of the town, &c. After hearing Mr Fraser, the Council unanimously recommended the inhabitants to enrol themselves. Of course the immediate cause of this proposed enrolment was the unsettled condition of the country following on the French Revolution; but the appeal thus made

CAPTAIN HON. ROBERT CARNEGIE CHARGING WITH GORDON HIGHLANDERS AT CAESAR'S CAMP, LADYSMITH.

OUT ON THE VELDT.

BY WILLIAM ALLAN, M.P.

OUT on the veldt Angus Gordon was lying,
Angus, the pride of the Highland Brigade ;
Out on the veldt the young warrior was dying,
Hit! when the tempest of bullets was flying
From the long trenches the Boers had made ;
Back we were driven from hills so defended,
Leaving our comrades behind us untended—
Out on the veldt.

The dank dews of death over Angus were stealing
As darkness succeeded the twilight's sad grey,
Vainly he strove as his senses were reeling,
To staunch the dark wound from whose ruddy revealing
The fount of his life-blood was ebbing away ;
While death's cruel fire was his throbbing heart burning
As he lay in wild agony writhing and turning—
Out on the veldt.

Ere passed the life-light from his blue eyes for ever,
A vision of home and the Old Land appeared,
He saw the green hills and the dark purple heather,
He saw a wee cot by the loud-roaring river,
He saw his fond mother, and once again heard
Her sweet voice of love on his ear gently falling,
"Angus, my Angus!" she seemed to be calling—
Out on the veldt.

He listened with joy and his bright eyes shone brighter,
"Mother! I'm coming!" he faintly replied—
The moon looked with pity upon the young fighter,
Whose cheeks 'neath her cold kiss grew paler and whiter,
As slowly death's fingers his life-bonds untied ;
Then marched the brave soul, to the camp field of heaven,
Of Angus whose life for his country was given—
Out on the veldt.

ON GUARD!

(Founded on Fact.)

BY FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

HIS name was Alexander Kidd, and even B Company of the Black Watch—fond as it was of nicknames—could find none better suited to him than his own; for “sandy” he was, and not even a baby in arms could have been more child-faced, more child-hearted, than this “kid.” So they called him either interchangeably; and the boy laughed at both names, as he had laughed at life generally, ever since he had been born in a ploughman’s cottage in the Howe o’ Strathmore, not far from Glamis. His father, an honest, dour man, of the true type of ploughman who learns silence or short speech behind his team, would say briefly, with a look at the gude-wife, that Sandy was a Souttar, as if that explained everything. Perhaps it did; since if tales be true the “Souters o’ Forfar” were not always so douce as their neighbours. Not that Sandy was a bad boy. Far from it; he only laughed more than his brothers and sisters, and cried more, too, when he was a little chap.

Yet when the time came for him to leave the ploughman’s cottage and follow the drum, as he had consistently and persistently said he would ever since he could speak, there were neither tears nor smiles. He just stood fair, and tail, and young, in his brand new uniform, and kissed his mother silently. Then he and his father shook hands. It was rather a long hand-shake, so that he had time to say, almost apologetically, “Weel, weel; I must just awa,” before No. 34 B Company marched through the little garden patch, keeping time, no doubt, to the unseen drum and fife which had called him all his life.

It was a time of peace, not war, and he was only one of a draft for India; but India was an unknown land full of possibilities for Sandy Kidd, as it has been for so many sons of Angus. For it lives still, in some parts of the countryside, that glamour of the East which, in the old Company days, sent whole families, like the Binnys and the Arbuthnots, to seek the pagoda tree and return after long years, to tell of having found or lost it; to tell many another marvellous tale which sank into the hearts of another generation.

Perhaps he was not aware of the rule which until very lately was in force, namely, that every soldier going to India should pay the War Office for his coffin in advance; but if he had been, it is doubtful if the knowledge would have checked the young recruit's huge enjoyment of life.

Even the journey by rail from Bombay to Meean Mir, which is surely the most deadly and distressing of experiences—even with the halt at Deolali thrown in—was to him an unending panorama of amusement.

"For Godsake give the Kid a bottle, an' stop its crowin'," said one of the older men who had been to India before, when, in the early dawn, they were roused out of their attempt to sleep by the boy's laugh. He laughed at everything; the crows, the sleeping yellow dogs, the bits of old rail which did duty as bells, the *baboo*s; even at himself for being there, an alien, a stranger, and yet one to whom the sons of the soil salaamed.

Perhaps it was the perception of this fact which made him noticeably graver by the time his journey was over. Meean Mir, itself, however, might have been sufficient to explain the fact; Meean Mir with its circling horizon of risen dust, its centring plain of fallen dust, bare, treeless, broken only by the crumbling bricks of forgotten graves. On the other hand, it may have been the tales which the older men had to tell; tales which inevitably crop up afresh for every young soldier in India. Of the dark days of mutiny, the bright ones of untarnished fidelity to the flag. Jhansi, Cawnpore, Delhi, Meerut, what words were these to conjure withal! Small wonder, indeed, if a soldier-lad's face should pale, his laugh die down, as the memorial spire, red as the Ridge itself, showed above the trees in which the taken city of Delhi hides itself from view.

Then last of all, it is sobering for any recruit to find himself—without warning—one of an army of twenty-six thousand men gathered together to do honour to Her Majesty on the anniversary of her assuming the title of Empress of India!

It is a big title. Those three days and nights of continuous travelling by rail—for the draft had hurried up so that the regiment might look its best on the great day—had brought so much home to the most thoughtless of these boys.

The last day of the old year was just breaking when the draft marched from the station into camp, and on New Year's Day—Proclamation Day—the biggest parade that Meean Mir had seen for many a long year was to be held. Half the Punjab was in to see the show, to join in the festivities of the Viceroy's visit to Lahore. Far as the eye could reach the white tents rose, and all day long guns were firing in salute to the feudatory chiefs as they paid their visits of vassalage to the Viceroy's tent. It was the first time that Alexander Kidd had heard the constant reverberation of distant guns as an accompaniment to all the pomp and panoply of war in a big camp, and the noise of it straightway went to his head; so that instead of making up, as his companions did, for those three nights of snatched sleep, he spent every hour he had of leisure in wandering about, careless of the blinding sun, careless of all things but his curiosity and the growing sense of elation, yet of responsibility, that was coming to his young laughter. Then it was Hogmanay, and when he came back at tattoo, after filling heart and brain with strange new things, all centering round the English flag which rose in front of the Viceroy's big darbar tent, there was "Auld Lang Syne" to be sung, and the toast that is drunk in silence to be given. Sandy, like the kid he was, drank it in milk, for somehow his young healthy taste had not as yet taken to strong drinks. And when more than one veteran, disposing of a "stiff un," shook their heads and warned him that milk was worse than whisky in India, he had his child-like, incredulous laugh for the wisdom. He had drunk nothing else but milk coming up in the train, for it had been a novelty to him to see the great earthen jars of it being hawked about at every station. And he had never felt better in his life! Never! though he had scarcely slept for three nights. Yet he was not sleepy. How could a "recruty" feel sleepy when he found himself in the smartest company of—naturally—the smartest regiment in the camp? Found himself also put in the front rank by the sergeant because of his marching. Yet who could help marching well when those unseen drums and pipes had been playing "Hieland Laddie" in one's ears ever since one could recollect anything at all? How could a "recruty" feel sleepy when the men on either side of him told him briefly that if he spoilt the show they'd kill him; when others in the tent were frankly jealous, and talked of d—d youngsters who didn't know what duty was? Under such circumstances, was it not better to sit up and polish everything that could be polished, and then sneak off to a quiet spot and show yourself how you could march to the tune that was singing and buzzing in your head—the tune of Empire which had that refrain of "Hieland Laddie?"

Sandy Kidd's fair baby face was more child-like than ever in its flushed cheeks and limpidly bright eyes, when—before starting for the march past—the sergeant formed his men up. An approving nod sent the lad into a seventh heaven of glory ; and after that he was conscious of nothing save himself and the flag that lay somewhere to his left. The older men looked for it, found it ahead, and so saved themselves for those few supreme minutes of actual passing ; but Alexander Kidd started as he finished, and finished as he began. The sun—dimmed by the dust of the battalion in front of him—was in his eyes as with every nerve on the strain, he tried to be a credit to the regiment.

The feu de joie took some of the strain from him ; but it returned again when in one long massed line, backed by battalions of dust rising from the feet of twenty-six thousand soldiers, the troops advanced for the salute. He could not help seeing the flag now ; it was straight in front of him rising out of glittering uniforms, seen against a queerer background than Sandy Kidd had ever dreamed of. Elephants in cuirasses and frontlets of gold, camels caparisoned in crimson and carrying wild figures hung with floating tassels ; dark faces beneath the sparkle of diamonds, sweet white faces that needed no jewels but their own eyes—

Then that sudden stop that made your heart stop beating also ; a clatter of arms, a surge of "God Save the Queen," and, above all, the wildest tumult of conceivable sound as a hundred and twenty elephants raised their gilded trunks and trumpeted !

How he managed to get back to tents Sandy scarcely knew. His head ached horribly ; he could not touch his food ; but he was glad he had not yielded to the impulse to go and lie down, when, later on, the order came for a guard to be sent to the Viceroy's camp. There was to be a big reception in the evening, and extra men would be wanted. The thought of this fresh honour seemed to do his headache good, and as the sun, sinking in the west, ceased to stare at him, even his laughter returned. But it was noisier than usual, and more than one of his companions told him to shut up and not make a fool of himself. But how could you help playing it, just a little, when, if luck would have it, you might be on guard at the very flag itself ; right before the entrance to the darbar tent ; right in view of everybody who came to do honour to the Representative of the Queen Empress ; right in front of every Rajah and Nawab, big or little, reminding them that they were but vassals of Empire !

But luck was against it. The westering of the sun had done Sandy Kidd's head good, but—strangely he thought—darkness made it worse. The chill which comes with the dusk set him shivering ; at least so he thought, till one of the older men said to another—

"Eh, mon! what am I aye tellin' ye. The boys they're sendin' us the noo are no' fit for the regiment. See to him—weel eneuch tae look at, but nae staminy—nae staminy ava! Ae blink o' the sun, an' fever an' agy—if it's no' waur"—he added, significantly.

Nevertheless they were kind to the fever-struck boy, and shook down a straw bed for him in the guard tent, and told him how the sun knocked the strongest down for a few hours, and that he might be himself again before morning. If not, it would be time then to go to hospital. They even made him strip to his shirt, and raised a blanket or two somehow, and then piled his clothes over him and more straw; so leaving him in the dark to wrestle, till he sweated, with the fever fiend. But as they went out he heard that grudging voice remark that it was well India had had better stuff in Mutiny time, else the flag might have been in more danger than it was.

True. The fever fiend whispered to Sandy Kidd that he was a failure, and all in the dark alone he reverted to that other childish habit of crying. It was so hard when one meant so differently. So very hard. And yet the tears seemed to cool his brain, to dim the visions of dark faces, women's faces, flags, elephants, and above all, of the red memorial spire above the red Ridge. So, with the faint strains of the National Anthem, played as the Viceroy entered the reception, in his ears, he fell asleep.

Yet scarcely asleep; the fever gripped him too hard for that; but he lay unconscious even of dreams, till suddenly they came back to him, and he sat up in the dark trembling—

Where was he? And where was the flag? God in heaven!—he had been on guard! He was on guard still! He was a traitor if he was not!—

He was out of the straw in a second; the next he was out in the night with his rifle—nothing else.

Number 35, B Company, had been keeping himself warm in the chill before dawn by walking up and down in the front of the sentry-box beneath the flag. But now there was a stir at the entrance to the tent; the sentries there pulled themselves together, as an aide-de-camp passed the word out that their Excellencies were leaving; so No. 35 turned back to his box.

"Halt! Who goes there?" rang out a challenge from within it.

At that moment the curtains of the tent door were drawn back in readiness, and, by the light which streamed out, a figure with nothing but a shirt on, yet with a rifle at the present, showed clearly, and No. 35 fell back with great promptitude.

"Who goes there? Halt! or I fire!" came the challenge again.

No. 35 stood rigid as a stone. He did not even dare to call for help. But the light had shown—as it could not fail to show—the strange sight to others at the door of the tent, and there was quick questioning and answer.

"You must get him out somehow," said the aide-de-camp hastily. "Her Excellency will be here directly."

The corporal hesitated. "We can shoot him, sir"—he began, thinking of the Kid's face as he had stood for inspection, and doubting if anything else would succeed. Yet he went forward a step or two with soothing words—

"Halt! Who goes there?" came the challenge once more.

"You must rush him from behind. I tell you Her Excellency——" began the aide frantically; then paused, for it was too late.

Down the crimson-carpeted anteroom came a man with a star on his breast, and a woman with a sweet kind face. Nothing very grand about them; just an Englishman and an Englishwoman. But she was a soldier's daughter, and she understood.

"Perhaps," she suggested quietly, "if you were to relieve guard?——"

The corporal's face beamed assent, as he saluted. "You've hit it, ma'am," he said, enthusiastically, forgetful of dignities.

So, with the aide as officer, a patrol formed up, and marched towards the sentry-box, where Sandy Kidd kept guard over the flag.

"Guard turn out!"

"Who goes there?"

"Officer's patrol."

"Give the countersign, officer's patrol."

"Empire."

"Pass, officer's patrol."

There was no pause, no hesitation, and the guardian of the Empire stepped further into the light, his bare white limbs showing clear against the chill darkness. He had kept his post. His work was done.

They handed him a greatcoat, saying it was his, and he put it on. So, obediently, he went to hospital; and he stayed there for a week or two. He even smiled when a lady with a kind face, who the nurses told him was Her Excellency, came and brought him a bunch of violets. She reminded him of his mother. Perhaps that was why he seemed to forget all things, even the Empire, after that, and to be a boy again fishing in the Curbett, laughing at everything.

But the drums and fifes claimed him to the last, though his ears could not hear them playing "The Flowers of the Forest," and though the salute which rang out over the grave of a soldier was the only fire he had ever been under: his only service, save that one "On Guard."

For enteric kills more young soldiers than any war, and will do so, till we choose to fight the wrong that lies at our own doors.

“GOOD-BYE.”

BY REV. JAMES MURRAY.

I HEAR the call—my country's call—
On Scotsmen shall she call in vain?
Good-bye, Sweetheart! Sweetheart, good-bye!
For I must sail across the main
To fight for Queen and Fatherland,
Away upon a foreign strand.

Behind the Sidlaws sinks the sun
That flecks with gold our Northern sea;
Before the darkness on us falls
I, dear, must tear myself from thee—
But naught on earth can break the tie
That binds two hearts. My love, Good-bye!

By Modder's grim and bloody trench,
By Tugela's swift and drumly wave,
Our Angus men stand side by side
Among the bravest of the brave,—
Thou wouldst not keep me, though I sigh
Good-bye, Sweetheart! Sweetheart, good-bye!

From Lunan bents to lone Lochlee,
From silver Esk to queenly Tay,
From many a home in Angus towns
They march away! they march away!
“For Queen and country!” Hear their cry—
Good-bye, Sweetheart! Sweetheart, good-bye!

Dear Fatherland ! Should one refuse
The best beloved to shield her name,
Our patriot fathers from their graves
Would cry him shame ; would cry him shame.
Then let me go and cease to sigh
When honour calls. Sweetheart, good-bye !

And when the hard campaign is o'er,
And gallant troops home proudly come,
Two Angus hearts will fondly beat
To music of the pipe and drum !
We'll meet, no more to part or sigh,—
Good-bye, Sweetheart ! Sweetheart, good-bye !

FOUR ANGUS WARRIORS.

BY A. H. MILLAR, F.S.A. SCOT.

JAMES GRAHAM, FIRST MARQUIS OF MONTROSE.

JAMES GRAHAM, "the great Marquis" of Montrose, was, according to Wishart, "Chief of the Grahams, a most ancient and famous family in Scotland." He could trace his descent from William de Graham of Abercorn and Dalkeith, who flourished early in the twelfth century, and was one of the witnesses to the Charter of 1128, whereby David I. founded the Abbey of Holyrood. The first of the Grahams to settle in Forfarshire was William's great-grandson, David de Graham, who obtained the lands of Kinnaber and other property near Montrose, about 1200, from William the Lion. Among his famous descendants were Sir John the Graham, the companion-in-arms of Sir William Wallace; Sir Patrick Graham of Kincardine, who fell at the battle of Dunbar; Sir Patrick, Earl of Strathearn; Malise, Earl of Menteith; Sir William of Kincardine, who obtained the lands of Auld Montrose in 1407, and married the sister of James I., thus becoming ancestor of the Grahams of Claverhouse; Patrick, first Lord Graham (1445); William, first Earl of Montrose (1504), who fell, with his brother George, on Flodden Field; and many others whose names are deeply wrought into the history of Scotland.

James Graham was the only son of John, fourth Earl of Montrose, and of Margaret, daughter of William, first Earl of Gowrie. He was born in 1612, succeeded his father in 1626, when in his fourteenth year, and matriculated at St Andrews in January 1627. In 1629 he married Magdalen, daughter of the first Earl of Southesk, and spent several years on the Continent, returning to this country in 1634, equipped alike as scholar and soldier, and accounted "one of the most accomplished gentlemen of the age." His reception at the Court of Charles I. was not so appreciative as he expected; and probably disappointment had some share in driving him to take up the cause of the Covenanters. It has been asserted that Montrose was then in favour of giving representation in Parliament to the people; hence his joining in the popular movement against Episcopacy. In November, 1637, he was received at Edinburgh as one of the Presbyterian leaders, and took an active part in imposing the Covenant in the following year. The abolition of Episcopacy by the General Assembly at Glasgow in 1638 had his full approval, and he became the acknowledged head of the party. Consequently when Scotland rose in arms against the King, Montrose was the principal military officer, and successfully led the Covenanters' army to Aberdeen, which he occupied, "imposing the Covenant, at the point of the sword, upon the inhabitants of the town and the surrounding country." After this victorious campaign, Montrose was invited to meet the King at Berwick, and it seems that the eloquence of Charles I. won him over, or at least made him disaffected towards the Covenanters. The result of this conference was the Cumbernauld Bond, dated August, 1640, by which Montrose and several other noblemen practically undertook to restore the King's prerogatives.

The position of Montrose at this time has been thus reasonably described:—When he first went to the Court at Whitehall he found Scotland under the control of the Marquis of Hamilton and Archbishop Laud, and to resist them he joined the Covenanters; but it was soon apparent to him that he had exchanged the tyranny of Hamilton plus the King, for the worse tyranny of Argyll minus the King, so he finally decided to abandon the Presbyterians and devote his sword to the Royalist cause. Thenceforth the struggle was between Montrose and Argyll, but the details of that long contest cannot here be repeated. Suffice it to say that on 11th June, 1641, Montrose was arrested and imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, and remained in captivity till the beginning of the following year. He retired to his own house, but continued to plot against both Hamilton and Argyll. Preparations were made to overthrow the Presbyterian party, and to invade Scotland in the King's name. On 16th May, 1644, Montrose was raised in the Peerage to the rank of Marquis, and was constituted Captain-General of the King's Forces in Scotland. At the head of the Royalist army he defeated the Covenanters at Tibbermuir, Alford, and Aberdeen, and achieved two notable victories at Inverlochy and Kilsyth. On 13th September, 1646, he was surprised and defeated by General Leslie, and though he kept up a guerilla warfare in the north for some time, the news of the King's surrender compelled him to desist. He made his escape to the Continent, where he remained till after the execution of Charles I. He then organised an army with which he invaded Scotland, landing at Orkney in March, 1650, and ravaging Caithness and Sutherland. After suffering a severe reverse near Tain, Montrose was forced to flee, and while a fugitive he was betrayed by Macleod of Assynt, captured, taken to Edinburgh, and executed 21st May, 1650, without even the form of a trial. His dismembered body, after having been exposed for some time in the principal Scottish towns, was buried at the foot of the gallows in Edinburgh; but after the Restoration, Charles II. caused his remains to be disinterred, and buried honourably in St Giles Cathedral, Edinburgh.

Montrose's latest biographers—the Rev. A. D. Murdoch and H. F. Morland Simpson, the translators of "The Deeds of Montrose"—write thus regarding him:—"Montrose is a historical paradox; the victorious Covenanting leader of the Bridge of Dee is the champion of the King unto death; the friend of Spottiswoode is a ruling elder in the Glasgow Assembly which excommunicates him." Bishop Wishart, the friend, companion, biographer of Montrose, thus eulogises the hero in the Latin poem which he wrote on the first anniversary of his execution:—"The glorious hero, Montrose, at once the shame and glory of his ungrateful country, her pride and her reproach, Scotland's love and sorrow, ascends to his starry home, Heaven's shining palaces, the stately mansions of the angels beyond the spheres. There beneath his feet beholding the vanities of the perishing world, he has his joyous portion in the honour and love of God."

The most familiar portrait of Montrose is that by Honthorst which is now at Brechin Castle, and which has been frequently reproduced. It is given in Mark Napier's "Memoirs of Montrose," in Taylor's "Pictorial History of Scotland," in Chambers's "Eminent Scotsmen," and in Murdoch and Simpson's "Deeds of Montrose." The portrait of him by George Jamesone of Aberdeen (the "Scottish Vandyck") which is now in the possession of the Earl of Southesk at Kinnaird Castle, is included in "The Muster-Roll of Angus" by the kind permission of Lord Southesk. It shows Montrose in his bridal dress, before his marriage to the daughter of the first Earl of Southesk, and is of interest alike to the historian and to the art-critic.

JOHN GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE. VISCOUNT OF DUNDEE.

FEW men of his rank have caused more controversy among historians than John Graham of Claverhouse. By one party he is hailed as the "lion-hearted warrior," and apostrophised as "Last of Scots, and last of freemen;" by another party he is denounced as "the despot's Champion," and is depicted as a barbarous monster, who warred alike upon unarmed men, defenceless women, and helpless children. Both pictures are distorted and exaggerated, and the truth will be found between these extreme views, though Claverhouse still waits the advent of an impartial biographer. John Graham was descended from Sir William Graham, Lord of Kincardine, who was married to Lady Mary Stewart, daughter of Robert III. The eldest son of this marriage was Sir Robert Graham of Fintry, whose wife was Janet (not Elizabeth) daughter of Sir Richard Lovell of Ballumbie. Of the two sons of Sir Robert, the elder became the founder of the Grahams of Fintry, and the younger was John Graham of Balargus, ancestor of the Grahams of Claverhouse. Sir William Graham of Claverhouse married Lady Jean Carnegie, daughter of the first Earl of Northesk, and his eldest son was John, afterwards Viscount of Dundee. He was born about 1643, and studied at St Andrews University. Having completed his course, he took service in France as a volunteer, and was afterwards a Cornet in the Dutch Guards. In 1674 he saved the life of the Prince of Orange at the battle of Seneff, and was then promised the command of the first Scots Regiment in the Netherlands. But he was twice deceived. Hugh Mackay of Scourie was promoted to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy in 1675, and again in 1677 Mackay was made Colonel in succession to Henry Graham. Insulted by this duplicity, John Graham resigned his commission and returned to Scotland in 1677; and it is worth noting that at Killiecrankie he opposed his old rival Mackay, and fought against the faithless Prince of Orange.

Shortly after his return to Scotland, John Graham was appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry raised for the purpose of enforcing the Episcopalian ritual on Scottish Presbyterians. His severity in accomplishing this task has been frequently condemned, especially by historians on the Whig side. On the other hand, it is maintained that as he held a commission it was his duty to execute the King's commands, and to shorten the Civil War by extreme measures. He received a severe check from the Covenanters at Drumclog, on 1st June, 1679, but three weeks afterwards he avenged his defeat by the victory of Bothwell Brig. His services to the Royalists were acknowledged and rewarded. In 1682 he was made Sheriff of Wigtonshire, and in 1684 he was sworn of the Privy Council, made Colonel of a Royal regiment of horse, and received the lands and Castle of Dudhope and the Constabulary of Dundee, which had fallen to the Crown through the forfeiture of Charles Maitland, Lord Haltoun. In 1688 he held the rank of Major General, and in that year assumed, with the King's consent, the office of Provost of Dundee. On 12th November, 1688, he was created a Peer of Scotland, with the titles of Lord Graham of Claverhouse and Viscount of Dundee. When the crisis of the Revolution came he adhered to the cause of James II., and counselled strong resistance. After the flight of the King, Dundee endeavoured to oppose the Revolution Settlement in Scotland; but failing to rouse the Convention of Estates, he retired to Dudhope Castle, setting out from that place to enter upon the campaign which was terminated at Killiecrankie, in July, 1689, where the gallant leader fell in the moment of victory. He was ambitious, but he had ability to justify his ambition, and he succeeded in raising himself from the position of a humble Forfarshire laird to the rank of Viscount, with the reputation of being the bravest and most chivalrous military leader of his time. The adverse judgment upon Dundee may be traced back to Wodrow's partisan history, written for the purpose of lauding the Covenanters at the expense of the King and the Episcopalians; but some letters written by Dundee, which were lately discovered by Sir William Fraser, tend to clear him from many of these aspersions. The student of history must choose between the detraction of Dundee's enemies, and the partiality of his friends, as in the lofty tone adopted by James Philip of Almerieclose, Dundee's comrade in arms at the last struggle, in his Latin poem of "The Grameid," the opening passage of which has been thus translated:—"We sing the noble Leader, calling brave men to arms for an exiled King, and himself rushing to meet cruel wounds. We sing the Graham, the great Hero, terrible in the dust of battle, mighty in spirit and in arms. We tell of warlike deeds for times to come."

WILLIAM, SEVENTH EARL OF NORTHESK.

FROM the time when John de Balinhard acquired the lands of Carnegie in 1340, and assumed the designation of John de Carnegie, the family which he founded has given many prominent men to the service of their country, in the Court, the Senate, and the Camp. Walter de Carnegie of Kinnaird was one of the victorious leaders of the Royalist army at the battle of Brechin in 1452. Sir Robert Carnegie of Kinnaird was one of the early Senators of the College of Justice founded by James V. in 1532, having been appointed to that high office in 1537, and frequently serving as an ambassador to England and France. Two of his grandsons were raised to the peerage—David, the elder brother, being created Earl of Southesk, while the younger brother, John, was successively made Baron Lour and Earl of Ethie, the latter titles being exchanged by him in October, 1666, for those of Baron Rosehill of Rosehill and Earl of Northesk. To the latter branch of the Carnegie family belonged the distinguished naval commander, William, seventh Earl of Northesk. He was the third son of George, sixth Earl of Northesk, and Anne, daughter of the Earl of Leven, and was born on 10th April, 1758, at Leven Lodge, near Edinburgh. He chose his father's profession and entered the Royal Navy in 1771 when in his thirteenth year, serving first with the Hon. Captain Barrington in the "Albion," and afterwards with Captain Macbride in the "Southampton," frigate. In 1777 he was appointed master of the "Apollo" by Lord Howe, and served on the American station. Thence he was transferred to the "Royal George," and set out with the fleet under Sir John Lockhart Ross in May, 1779, which joined Admiral Rodney at the Spanish Coast; and he was present at the famous action on 9th January, 1780, off Cape Finisterre, when the Spanish convoy, carrying provisions to the force besieging Gibraltar, was captured. He accompanied the prizes to Gibraltar, and assisted in the relief of the garrison. Rodney's fleet encountered the Spanish fleet off Cape St Vincent on 16th January, and made havoc among them, carrying off the admiral, Don Juan de Langara, as a prisoner. On February 13th, Carnegie sailed under Rodney from Gibraltar for the West Indies, having a position in the "Sandwich," the admiral's flag-ship. With Rodney he was present at the battle off Martinique on 18th April, 1780, and so heroic was his conduct that the admiral appointed him to the command of the "Blast" fire-ship. On the 7th April, 1782, he was advanced to the rank of post-captain, and took part in the glorious victory by Rodney over De Grasse, off Guadaloupe, on 12th April in that year. He returned to England in the "Enterprise," frigate, and was paid off at the peace of 1783. His eldest brother, David, died without issue on 19th February, 1788, and as the second son had died in infancy, Captain Carnegie succeeded to the courtesy title of Lord Rosehill. On 9th December in that year he was married at Paris to Mary Ricketts, niece of the renowned Admiral John Jervis, Earl of St Vincent. He entered upon active service in 1790, taking command of the "Hermione," frigate.

George, sixth Earl of Northesk, died at Ethie House on 22nd January, 1792, being then the third flag officer in the British Navy, and Lord Rosehill succeeded to the title and estates. In January, 1793, he sailed to the West Indies in the "Beaulieu," frigate, returning with a convoy in the "Andromeda." He was appointed to the command of the "Monmouth," 64 guns, in 1796, and joined the North Sea fleet under Admiral Duncan. The mutiny at the Nore had affected some of the seamen in Admiral Duncan's fleet, and some of the ships had to be sent back to England lest the lawless spirit manifested should spread throughout the fleet. The "Monmouth" was one of the vessels thus returned; and when the vessel came to the Nore, a number of the mutineers on the "Sandwich," led by Richard Parker, boarded the "Monmouth," and appealed to Lord Northesk to lay their claims before the Admiralty, as they considered him "the seaman's friend." He went on board the "Sandwich," and held a conference with the ringleaders, engaging to lay their grievances before the authorities. In Toone's "Chronological Historian" the result is thus briefly narrated:—"1797, June 7; Lord Northesk, captain of the "Monmouth," arrived at the Admiralty from on board the rebel fleet at the Nore, with a petition to the Board, couched in very lofty language; and a letter to His Majesty, in which the mutineers threatened to do something which would astonish the nation if their terms were not complied with." The application had no effect, for the ringleaders were tried by court-martial during the latter half of June, and the foremost of the mutineers, including Parker, were executed. As Lord Northesk did not rejoin the North Sea Fleet, he had no share in the glorious victory of Camperdown, which rendered famous the name of his neighbour and old shipmate, Admiral Duncan.

Having resigned the command of the "Monmouth," Lord Northesk was not in active service till 1800, when he was placed in the "Prince," 98 guns, and joined the Channel Fleet under his kinsman, the Earl of St Vincent. In this vessel he remained till the peace of April 1802, and he was unemployed till the declaration of war against France was made on 18th May, 1803. Lord Northesk was then appointed to the command of the "Britannia," 100 guns, and took his place in the Channel Fleet under Admiral Sir William Cornwallis, and this position he retained till May, 1804, when he was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral of the White. He made the "Britannia" his flag-ship, and was commissioned to maintain the blockade of Brest during the winter of that year, a task which he successfully accomplished. In October, 1805, Lord Northesk was ordered to join the fleet under Vice-Admiral Collingwood, off Cadiz, and he was thus third in command at the battle of Trafalgar on 21st October. His share in that victory is thus described in "The Carnegies of Southesk":—"The 'Britannia,' which still bore his flag, broke through the enemy's line astern of their fourteenth ship, pouring in on each side a tremendous and destructive fire, and continued engaging the enemy's ships on both sides of her—frequently two or three of them at a time, with very little intermission, for five hours, when all resistance ceased." About the middle of the action, Admiral Lord Nelson was fatally wounded, and the completion of the conflict thus devolved upon Collingwood and Northesk. Their success was duly acknowledged. On 26th November the Court of Common Council of the City of London directed that "the thanks of the Court, and the freedom of the city, and a sword of 200 guineas value, be awarded to Vice-Admiral Lord Collingwood, and the freedom of the city and a sword of 100 guineas value be awarded to Rear-Admiral Lord Northesk." In January, 1806, Lord Northesk received the dignity of G.C.B., and both houses of Parliament passed votes of thanks to him, while a vase, valued at £300, was presented from the Patriotic Fund at Lloyd's. On 2nd August, 1806, the King gave him authority to bear an augmentation of arms introducing the name "Trafalgar" on the shield over the arms of the Carnegies of Northesk, the eagle bearing a naval crown, and the supporters holding banners with the words, "Britannia Victrix."

Lord Northesk was raised to the rank of Vice-Admiral in April, 1808, of Admiral in July, 1814, and of Rear-Admiral of Great Britain in November, 1821. He was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the British Navy at Plymouth in May, 1822, and remained there till 1830. He died in Albemarle Street, London, on 28th May, 1831, in his seventy-third year, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, where a brass tablet is erected to his memory, beside the monument of his fellow-warrior, Lord Nelson. Two of Lord Northesk's sons entered the navy. George, Lord Rosehill, his eldest son, born 1791, was drowned at sea in the wreck of the "Blenheim," in February, 1807. Swynfen Thomas Carnegie, Lord Northesk's fourth son, born 1813, rose to the rank of Rear Admiral, was a Companion of the Bath, a Knight of San Fernando of Spain, and had the decoration of the Medjidie of Turkey. He died on 29th November, 1879. The present (tenth) Earl is the great-grandson of Admiral the Earl of Northesk.

ADAM DUNCAN, VISCOUNT OF CAMPERDOWN.

ADMIRAL DUNCAN is one of the naval heroes whose career reflects glory not only on the County of Angus which gave him birth, but on the nation in whose service he spent his life. Of him it has been justly written by his latest biographer, the Earl of Camperdown (great-grandson of the Admiral) that "he had the honour to be one of the great Sea Commanders whom the perils of Great Britain in the eighteenth century called into existence. Boscawen, Hawke, Keppel, Howe, Rodney, Hood, St. Vincent, Nelson, Collingwood, were of the number." An earlier biographer thus tersely describes his character:—"It would perhaps, be difficult to find in modern history another man in whom, with so much meekness, modesty, and unaffected dignity of mind, were united so much genuine spirit, so much of the skill and fire of professional genius, such vigorous and active wisdom, such alacrity and ability for great achievements, with such entire indifference to their success, except so far as they might contribute to the good of his country." The student of naval history might say that had not the battle of Trafalgar been consecrated by the death of Nelson, and made thus more impressive for the popular mind, Duncan's victory at Camperdown, against superior numbers, and with the possibility of mutiny among his own men, would stand forth as one of the greatest naval victories recorded in history. And it is interesting to note that two "Men of Angus"—Lord Duncan and Lord Northesk—took part in both of these "glorious victories."

Adam Duncan was the second son of Alexander Duncan, of Lundie, who was Provost of Dundee from 1744 to 1747, and had thus the difficult task of ruling the burgh during the Jacobite Rising. His mother was Helen Haldane, daughter of John Haldane of Gleneagles, and he was the third son, having been born in the Provost's Mansion in the Seagate, Dundee, on 1st July, 1731. When about fifteen years of age Adam Duncan entered the Royal Navy as a midshipman, under his kinsman Captain Robert Haldane, and served with him on the "Shoreham," frigate, for three years. He exchanged in 1749 to the "Centurion," 50 guns, of which Captain (afterwards Admiral) Keppel was in command, and remained with that ship for six years. The interest taken by Keppel in the young midshipman was so great that to that eminent commander he owed much of his knowledge of seamanship. Under Keppel he served as midshipman, third, second, and first lieutenant, and flag and post captain, and even in his later years he was familiarly known as "Keppel's Duncan." For two years the "Centurion" was cruising in the Mediterranean, endeavouring to check the expeditions of the Moorish pirates; and after her return Keppel was appointed Commodore of the North American Station, and Duncan received his grade of Lieutenant on 10th January, 1755, and set out with Keppel in the "Centurion" to convoy the troops under General Braddock to take part in the American War. On his return a year afterwards, Keppel removed to the "Torbay," 74 guns, and Duncan joined him on 10th July, 1756, with the rank of Second Lieutenant. For nearly three years Duncan was with the Channel Fleet, employed in the blockade of Brest and other services; but at length in October, 1758, he was sent with the expedition under Keppel to take the Island of Goree, near Cape Verd, and there Duncan received a wound in the leg from a musket ball—the only wound he ever received in the fifty actions in which he was engaged during his life. He obtained the rank of First Lieutenant after this battle, and from this date his promotion was rapid. He was gazetted Commander on 21st September, 1759, and Post Captain on 25th February, 1761, and appointed to the "Valiant," 74 guns, serving under his old friend and patron, Admiral Keppel. When the Admiral set out on his expedition to Belleisle, he made the "Valiant" his flagship, and Duncan honourably distinguished himself in the conflict. From this place the Admiral and his protege set out for the West Indies and remained there till the conclusion of the war with Spain.

Britain was at peace for several years, and Duncan was not actively employed till the renewal of hostilities in 1778, when he was appointed to the command of the "Monarch," and served under Admiral Sir Charles Hardy against the combined French and Spanish fleets. Towards the close of 1779 a powerful flotilla was formed, under the command of Admiral Keppel, and dispatched to the relief of Gibraltar, in which service Captain Duncan again distinguished himself. It was his fortune to return to Gibraltar in 1782 in Admiral Howe's fleet, and he was specially mentioned for his bravery in the conflict that took place at the Straits in October of that year. When the hostilities were terminated in 1783, Duncan exchanged to the "Edgar," 74 guns, one of the Plymouth guard-ships, and here he remained for the usual period of three years. On 14th September, 1783, he was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral of the Blue; on 24th September, 1786, he was gazetted Rear-Admiral of the White; on 3rd February, 1793, he became Vice-Admiral of the Blue; on 12th April, 1794, he was raised to the grade of Vice-Admiral of the White; and on 1st June, 1795, he was made Admiral of the Blue. These rapid steps in promotion were not the result of active service, for Duncan had not obtained command in any of the naval engagements between 1786 and 1795, though he had applied for posts on several occasions. At length his opportunity arrived. In April, 1795, he was appointed Commander-in-Chief in the North Sea, and chose the "Venerable," 74 guns, as his flag-ship. With that vessel his name was ever after to be honourably associated. After a cruise in the North Sea he returned with several French and Dutch prizes, and while his fleet lay in Yarmouth Roads there were symptoms of disaffection among his men, the result of the Mutiny at the Nore. By the exercise of discretion, suavity, and his powerful personal attractiveness, Admiral Duncan succeeded in quelling the symptoms of rebellion in his own fleet; but it was with a very insecure feeling that he set out again on 28th May, 1797, with orders to blockade the Dutch Fleet in the Texel, for his confidence in the loyalty of his men had been shaken, and his fleet had been reduced. In estimating the importance of the victory at Camperdown, due allowance must be made for the difficulties which the Admiral had to encounter among his own followers.

The orders given to Admiral Duncan in May were that he was to keep the Dutch fleet under Admiral De Winter from leaving the Texel and joining the French fleet in a projected descent upon Ireland. Though Duncan's fleet was so inferior in numbers at the first that he did not dare to risk an encounter, he managed to blockade the Texel for more than eighteen weeks. He had to return to Yarmouth to refit, and De Winter took the opportunity of Duncan's absence to venture out to sea. When Duncan returned in October to a point opposite the coast between Egmont and Camperdown, he found the Dutch fleet in the open. By a daring and risky movement Duncan formed his line of battle so as to place the principal Dutch ships between himself and the shore, while he sent a portion of his fleet to leeward, so as to prevent the enemy receiving support from the land. On 11th October the battle of Camperdown was fought, with much bravery on both sides, and resulted in a great victory for Duncan, who took as his prisoners the three Dutch commanders—Admiral De Winter, Vice-Admiral Reyntjes, and Rear-Admiral Meuses. The plan which the French Directorate had conceived, of throwing a French and Dutch Army of Invasion into Ireland—which, with the Channel Fleet demoralised by mutiny, might have been easily accomplished—was thoroughly destroyed, and Britannia had once more justified her claim to rule the waves. The importance of the victory was enthusiastically acknowledged. On 17th October, 1797, the Admiral was created Viscount Duncan of Camperdown and Baron Duncan of Lundie. The freedom of the city of London was conferred upon him, together with a sword valued at 200 guineas; he received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, and the Crown bestowed upon him a pension of £2000 per annum, to be continued to himself and the two next holders of the title; and Dundee, Glasgow, and Dublin placed his name on their Rolls of eminent burgesses, and gave him suitable memorial presentations. A special thanksgiving service was held in St Paul's Cathedral, London, on 19th December, at which the King and the Royal Family were present, Admiral Duncan carrying in the procession the flag of the Dutch Admiral which he had taken at Camperdown. The Admiral's portrait was painted for the Dundee Town Council, and a service of plate was presented to him. The old name of the estate of Lundie was changed to Camperdown, and in Glasgow and Edinburgh there were convivial clubs founded having the designation of "Camperdown." On 14th February, 1799, Lord Duncan was raised to the rank of Admiral of the White, and he retained his position as Commander-in-Chief in the North Sea until the spring of 1800, when he retired into private life. In July, 1804, he went to London to offer his services to the Admiralty. He was then in indifferent health, and had suffered from recent family bereavement, which had broken down his spirit. On his way home from London he was taken ill suddenly, and died at Cornhill, near Coldstream, on 4th August, 1804, being then in his seventy-third year. His body was brought to the churchyard of Lundie, and interred there, where a simple slab briefly records the dates of the birth and death of a great naval hero. A splendid monument to his memory, with a life-size marble figure of the Admiral, stands in St Paul's Cathedral, a testimonial from a grateful nation; but the modest inscription on the humble panel in Lundie kirkyard, which was partly devised by himself, is more typical of that earnest, sincere, whole-hearted Scottish patriot, Admiral Viscount Duncan of Camperdown.

A PEACEFUL DUTCH SUBJECT.

BY A. S. EDWARD, R.B.A.

"A CUP OF COLD WATER."

BY THE HON. MRS GREENHILL-GARDYNE.

A LITTLE lad of tender years,
Of worn and feeble frame—
For him the lamp of life burns low,
No oil to feed the flame.
He lies within the shadow-land,
His course is well-nigh o'er ;
No more for him shall daisies bloom,
Nor laverocks sing and soar.

But high the spirit thrills with life!
His mind is active still ;
His busy fancy wakes the power
Of kindling heart and will ;
His being is athirst to hear
Of daring deeds afar ;
His thoughts by day, his dreams by night,
Are centred in the war.

He sees the tents in scattered lines
Spread o'er the dusty veldt ;
He sees the burning light of heaven,
In purple distance melt ;
He hears the martial bugle-call,
'The rolling of the drum,
The tramp and swing of marching bands
As to and fro they come.

Ah, more than this his vision shows!
From rocky mountains steep
Flashes the deadly rifle-fire,
The screaming shrapnel sweep ;
Unshaken in the swift advance,
Steady the bold attack—
Only—a line of fallen men
Has marked that onward track.

"Think you, might I rise up once more,
Once more be well and strong,
That to the war I might go forth,
As I so greatly long?"
"My child," his kindly friend replied,
"How could your wish come true?
How could you be a soldier brave,
A little lad like you?"

"I could not be a soldier brave,
A soldier of the Queen;
I could not join the desp'rate charge—
My strength is small and mean.
Yet, maybe, I could give some help;
How gladly, if I might,
A drink of water I would bring
To those who fall in fight!"

Spirit of War, stern monitor!
Though awful is thy face,
Yet sometimes in thine aspect grave
A milder glance we trace.
When at thy touch sweet pity fills
The heart of Innocence,
We know true insight is vouchsafed
Unto that purer sense.

For ever amid storm and strife
The lines of progress grow;
The truest peace-makers are they
Who fearless meet the foe.
The ardour of self-sacrifice
Shall lighten every toil,
And fairest flowers of love shall spring
From that blood-watered soil.

PROMOTED!

BY "FERGUS MACKENZIE."

THEY were a small company of the Queen's servants resting under the eaves of "The High Roof of the World," with the great shoulders of the Hindoo Koosh towering above them into the night. The sound of a stream rushing down the gorge fell upon the wearied soldiers' ears with a cadence softened by the distance. An occasional moan indifferently suppressed, a cry of pain, as one forgetful of his wound tried to turn on the hard bed of earth, let one understand that there had been a sharp engagement in the daylight; and now with the battle-fever slowly subsiding, suffering men put in the hours of darkness with what fortitude they might.

Colonel Dempster, who was in command, lay on the earth conversing in a subdued whisper with his faithful ally, Sergeant Chisholm. Both were men of Angus, and both came from the same parish—the one from the battered old Castle whose grey towers rose up among the beeches; the other from the croft with its thatched cottage on the brae head. This night, after the carnage in which blood flowed like water, and many a brave man saw the sun for the last time, their hearts were tender; they longed for the pleasant fields of their native land, for the familiar haunts, and for the faces and voices of old friends.

The two had been boys together, had fought, not side by side, but against each other with a stubborn dourness which had left with each a life-long respect for what the other could do; and when the young officer enrolled the enemy of his school days he was proud of his company. There was much coming and going between the castle and the croft; and with each letter from abroad, the laird and his lady had a message for Widow Chisholm, while she, too, had news to impart; and the difference in education and station was bridged over by the love of the parents for their soldier sons. It was with a common joy they heard of promotion to the two; and when the one attained his colonelcy and the other his sergeantship, it looked as if the world held little more for the fond parents except to have their sons home again.

"I had a letter from home to-day, Davie, and the old folk have a message for you. Your mother has not been as well as usual, but she is stepping about again. Influenza, they say—with perhaps a touch of old age; eh, Davie? My father has been keeping the house a deal of late, too," the officer said musing. He knew the years were whitening the hair and giving a stoop to the shoulders of his loved ones at home.

"When this business is ower, are we likely to be sent hame—for I wad sair like to set een on my auld mither again?" the sergeant asked with something of the fretfulness of an unweaned child.

"It is hard to say; for the ways of the War Office are past finding out. But I should like to see the old folk too. I would give something, Davie, for a scone fresh off your mother's griddle and a tumbler of milk. Would they taste as sweet as in the old days?"

"An' I wad fain spend a summer gumpin' for trout i' the Lunan as I did when I was a loon. I can smell the Queen-o'-the-Meadow yet."

"How these poor fellows are groaning! We have escaped without a scratch; how cold it has grown!"

The day had been fiercely hot, the night was as fiercely chill; and that intolerable thirst which seizes the wounded tormented the little company grievously. Some one with a strong Scotch accent groaned half-mournfully, half-mirthfully—

"Hech, sirs, but I am dry. I wad fain gie hauf-a-hunder o' thae hills for a'e drink o' caller water."

A merry little Ghurka, with a comical attempt at the idiom and accent, retorted—

"Hech, Sandy, but I am dry too"—and somebody laughed. It was well they had heart enough to laugh at their calamities.

The cry for water became more general; and a wounded soldier, springing to his feet in a delirium of fever, staggered stream-ward a few paces, when he sank to the earth groaning:—

"Get me water, or I shall go mad, mad, mad!"

The stream raved through the gorge far below; the banks on both sides were held by the enemy in force, and to attempt to get water from such a source was to court death. Yet the cry was become very bitter, and it wrung Colonel Dempster's heart.

"Davie," he said earnestly, "have you ever felt as Hagar felt when in the wilderness she turned aside that she might not see her child die? What would I not give to get this moaning stopped."

"Men," he cried, moved by a sudden impulse and unable to hear their complaining longer, "I shall fetch you water;" and unbuckling his sword with nervous haste he seized a pitcher; and was only prevented from setting out by the intervention of Sergeant Chisholm.

"Colonel Dempster, ye daurna gae, you canna gae; your safety is the safety o' the Company, and their lives hing on your life; let me gang;" and seizing the pitcher from the Colonel's grasp, he shouldered his gun and was ready to start.

"Leave your gun, Davie; everything you can do without, leave. It must be by speed, not by fighting that you can succeed," the Colonel said in a grave, low voice.

"Gin I dinna come back, Colonel, ye can tell my mither—oh—onything; that I hae married an Afridi, an' hae settled doon for gude; but ye'll gie her a look in whan ye get hame, an' ye can say—I—"

Davie Chisholm hesitated. He loved his mother—but he never said so much to himself, much less to another. "Ye can say I was speirin' for her;" and he dashed off into the darkness as lithe and fierce as a tiger. Woe to the Afridi who barred his passage!

In the suspense heightened by the darkness and inactivity, the moments dragged past with leaden feet; and only the rush of the stream or the thunder of a mass of rock hurtling down the mountain side fell upon the ear. The wounded men had ceased to moan; and a cry of dismay arose from the hill-side when down below a sudden clamour and the firing of many muskets broke out.

"Can he get through?" a hundred hearts were asking; and as the minutes slowly piled up into an hour with no sign of the returning soldier, their hopes sickened and died, and the wounded gave way to their moaning again. Colonel Dempster was bitterly regretting this madcap venture, when a sentinel called sharp and distinct—

"Who goes there?"

"Water from the well at Bethlehem's gate," was the quick response; and the soldiers, raising cheer after cheer, crowded about the Sergeant; while those harder hit sat up, waved their hands and made such demonstration as they could.

He was just telling of his adventures when a cry arose for more water; in his haste he had spilled half the pitcherful—and it more precious than gold!

"I'll gang again, lads!" he said readily; "I ken the lie o' the land, an' it'll be an easy job neist time. Besides they saw the first was a false alarm; an' they'll no stir so speedily anither time."

A second, a third time he threaded his way through a country sown thick with the enemy, through a land shadowing with wings, and those the wings of death; yet in perfect safety, without scratch or bruise, he made his way through a hail of bullets; and many a man as he raised the water to his burning lips whispered—

"God bless Sergeant Chisholm!"

"I shall recommend you for the V.C.; yours is a heroic deed, Chisholm," his officer said proudly.

In succeeding months events followed each other in rapid succession. The war on the ridge of the world was brought to an end; and prior to their leaving for the home country, the officers gave a grand Tamasha to certain Kashmir notables. But the feast, which was under Sergeant Chisholm's superintendence, was not a success; the salt was not salt, and certain puddings were thickly dusted over with a condiment which provoked profane language on the part of whoever tasted it. The sergeant swore it was cinnamon; the feasters swore it would have passed for powdered bath brick, had it not been for its monstrous effect. The War Office, whose ways are past finding out, took no notice of Colonel Dempster's recommendation; and it was the current belief that Sergeant Chisholm had forfeited his V.C. through failing to be as good a caterer as he had proved a soldier.

It was a pleasant thing to get home again, to stroll by the Lunan, and see the kindly faces of old friends; but when dark clouds gathered over South Africa and war was declared, not a man but longed to get into action! Off to the front again with light hearts Colonel Dempster and his men went, thinking little of death and much of hard work and stiff fighting, with the prospect of deserving a V.C., whether they got it or no.

It was the night before Magersfontein, and the Colonel took the precaution of confiding one or two matters to the care of Sergeant Chisholm.

"I have written home, Davie; and if anything happens to me you shall see to the letter and to my parents getting all information about me they wish. I have made everything right for your mother, in the case of anything happening to you."

The Sergeant said nothing. If a Scotchman speaks when he is moved, it is an infallible sign he is tipsy; and in a gayer tone the Colonel continued,

"You may get a V.C. this time; promotion of some sort, certainly."

"Ay, gin ye dinna set me to the cookin' again, Colonel," the Sergeant said mischievously; "in which case I may be reduced."

Colonel Dempster laughed as he recalled the sad havoc the Sergeant's catering had wrought among the officers and the notables of Kashmir.

"What did you use for salt on that never-to-be-forgotten occasion, Davie?"

"There was naething wrang wi' the saut; it was richt eneuch, and was the very best saut to be gotten," David answered doggedly.

"Yet no matter how much one took, it never got any salter!"

"That was hardly my wyte. I got it oot o' a bottle in your ain cupboard, labelled and never opened, so that there could be nae mistak'. It was ca'ed Eno's Fruit Salt; an' gin that werena guid eneuch, tell me whar I was likely to get better?"

Colonel Dempster laughed, and when one would have thought he had done laughing he set off afresh, much to the Sergeant's annoyance.

"And yon unearthly powder you sprinkled on the puddings, Davie; what was it? The like has not been tasted since."

"Yon, sir, was intended for grund ceennamon."

"Yes; and what was it?"

"I understood it to be grund ceennamon; I gied it for that, an' meant it to be ta'en for that."

"No doubt; but what was it, Davie?"

"Ye'll be a happier man, Colonel Dempster, gin ye never ken what yon grund ceennamon was; I'll alloo I made a slicht mistak' there, although the saut was a' richt," the Sergeant answered, blushing as he made this tantalising acknowledgment; and his officer had a greater desire to unearth the mystery than ever.

"Well, Davie, since you will not tell, and as I may not be here to-morrow to be told, you will see to the letter. May we get through the day's work with nothing worse than a whole skin; and promotion of some sort for the pair of us. Good night!" the Colonel said, as one says it who may be taking a last farewell.

"Gude nicht, sir; an' whatever befa' may we do oor pairt."

They made ready for an early start; and Colonel Dempster thinking of the unrewarded exploit of his Sergeant felt that had he lived in the days of the Psalmist he would have ranked among David's three mighty men. But valour had become so common in the British army of late that it might easily be overlooked.

Next day the battle of Magersfontein was fought, and men fell in swathes like grain before the reaper. Far into the hours of darkness the stretcher-bearers carried in the wounded and the dying; and officers and men waited with aching hearts for missing comrades and friends. Colonel Dempster's battalion had suffered severely, and only a battered handful answered the roll-call. Among the missing was Sergeant Chisholm.

The stretcher-bearers crowded up with their pitiful burdens, when the officer's eye caught the stricken face of his friend. In a moment he was by his side, and stooping over the helpless form he asked—

"Are you badly hit, Davie?"

The soldier smiled faintly, and whispered—

"Promoted at last, Colonel!"

"Can I do anything for you?"

"Ye'll no forget my auld mither? it'll be sair on her."

"She shall be provided for, Davie."

"God bless ye!"

Sergeant Chisholm closed his eyes, and the ashen hue of death crept over his lips, while Colonel Dempster knelt by his side holding the nerveless hand. For a moment the dying man opened his eyes and smiled.

"Yon grund ceennamon, Colonel——"

"Don't think about that, Davie," the officer exclaimed as he paused from weariness.

"Was Keating's Insect Poother."

"I do not care though it had been prussic acid, if you had escaped this day," the Colonel said vehemently. Then with bared head and a faltering tongue the strong man committed his friend, whose life-span was limited to moments, to the gracious care of Him who has vanquished death.

Sergeant Chisholm, bravest of the brave, was, through interest with certain Higher Powers, promoted to a grave on the Veldt; and in far-off Scotland two women sat by a peat fire weeping. The old Laird and his "Leddy" had gone to comfort Widow Chisholm with their son's letter, written on that fatal day. Amid her sobs the lady read, "A better man, a truer friend, a more fearless soldier in the hour of danger there was not."

The old Laird stood at the cottage window, erect, stern, with hands clasped behind his back, looking across the woods and the high grounds where the sky line touched. Far beyond the horizon his imagination travelled, till he saw the blood-red fields of Africa; and he prayed, "Oh that the reign of righteousness and love might come, that wars should cease, and peace dwell for evermore."

SOME CASTLES AND MANSIONS OF ANGUS.

BY GEORGE HAY, F.S.A. SCOT.

THE County of Angus is so rich in Castles and Mansions that merely to mention them would be to produce a catalogue of considerable length. Many of the old castles are in ruins, having been wrecked in the tribal or family feuds which were common in Scotland in times less happy than our own. In some instances, however, the ruin was not the work of war, but simply of time, the inconvenient though strong old tower being abandoned when, although every man's house continues to be his castle, it is no longer necessary that he should so build it as to enable it to resist a seige or an armed assault. Some of the older castles of the county, however, such as Glamis, that fine specimen of Scottish baronial architecture, are still inhabited houses, and are amongst the best houses in the kingdom; while, as at Kinnaird, the site of the old castle is occupied by one that is comparatively modern. About them all, and situated as they generally are on sites of natural beauty, there cling the charm of story and romance, often of ballad poetry, and the recollection of deeds which find a place in national history.

Not a few of the old castles cluster about or are in the district of the head town of the shire. Forfar itself, when the Scottish monarchy was somewhat migratory, was in the time of the Alexanders a royal residence; but of the castle in which the kings resided, and from which William the Lion made visits to Arbroath to watch from time to time the erection of his Abbey, nothing remains. Glamis, a few miles west from Forfar, was also a royal residence at an early date, and there is a constant tradition that one of the kings, Malcolm II., was murdered there in 1033. That was fully five hundred years before the erection of the present Castle of Glamis, the date of which is generally given as 1578. Some of the Castle is probably older. A bit of it must be older, if we are to accept as authentic the tradition that the worthy who is known in history as the "Tiger" Earl of Crawford, or "Earl Beardie," is in a shut-up room there, along with his boon companions, playing cards, rattling his dice boxes, and drinking his wine, and will continue to drink and gamble till the Day of Judgment. The weird tradition is that this interesting crew had consigned their souls to the Prince of Darkness, and were taken at their word. The well-known story further goes that the whereabouts of the hidden chamber is known only to the Earl of Strathmore, his heir, and the factor on the estates, and that this knowledge is transmitted by them to their successors. The Earl's family came into possession of Glamis in the fourteenth century by the marriage of Sir John Lyon with the second daughter of Robert II., the Princess bringing the thanedom of Glamis to her husband as her dowry. The family history of the Lyons is throughout very interesting. The Hon. Malcolm Bowes-Lyon, one of the Earl's sons, has gone to the front in the South African War, and in thus serving his country has shown himself worthy of the best of his ancestors.

At Kirriemuir we get to the centre, as it were, of what was once a very extensive barony, over which the ancient Earls of Angus, the immediate successors of the Celtic chiefs of the land, held sway. North from Kirriemuir, is Cortachy, the seat of the Earl of Airlie. The Ogilvys, who are descended from the second of the old Earls of Angus, obtained a grant of lands bearing their name from William the Lion. They have been at Cortachy since about the middle of the fourteenth century, and at Airlie, with its "Bonnie Hoose," from a century later. Cortachy is one of the instances of a house of palatial dimensions and character occupying the site of an ancient feudal keep. Its situation, with the river South Esk flowing through its extensive grounds, is very beautiful, as are all its surroundings. In fighting times the Ogilvys were a strong, masterful race, taking a prominent place in the history of Scotland, and active, as they still are, in the business of the shire. It would have been strange if to a family of such antiquity as that of Lord Airlie there did not attach a "ghost." The tradition is that when a member of the family is about to die strange music is heard within the castle—sometimes the wail of the bagpipe, sometimes the shrill sound of the fife and the beating of the drum, accompanied with a sound as of the tramp of soldiers. Having regard to the family history, it might well be the tramp of soldiers. Like many of his ancestors, the late Earl of Airlie served his country in war. Scorning a life of ease, with the soft allurements of beautiful Cortachy, he stuck to his profession as a soldier, serving under Field-Marshal Lord Roberts in the Boer War, as did also his brother, the Hon. Lyulph Ogilvy, and two of his nephews. Lord Airlie commanded the 12th Lancers. In an action near Bloemfontein he was wounded in the arm, and soon afterwards in fighting with the enemy to the east of Pretoria, leading his regiment in a charge, he fell mortally wounded.

About midway between Cortachy and Kirriemuir is Inverquharity, an old home of the Ogilvys. It dates from the fifteenth century, and is still a strong tower, not greatly damaged by time, but an example of the Angus Castles which have been abandoned by their owners owing to their unfitness as dwelling-houses to the requirements of modern life. At its entrance there is still a massive yett, or gate, of grated iron, such as are to be found at the entrance to many baronial houses in Scotland. These yetts were of a defensive character, and could only be erected by royal licence. The licence for the Inverquharity yett was granted by one of the Jameses to Sir Alexander Ogilvy. It was granted "to fortifie his hoose and strenth it." The licence still exists, and is in the possession of Sir Alexander's descendant, Sir Reginald Howard Alexander Ogilvy, Bart. of Inverquharity. It was Sir Alexander Ogilvy who, on 23rd January, 1445, fought in the sanguinary battle of Arbroath with the Lindsays, headed by the Master of Crawford—the "Tiger" Earl—for the office of Justiciar of the Abbey. In all the wars of Great Britain, and certainly not least so in the war in South Africa, it has been amply demonstrated that the refinements of modern life do not in our country diminish fighting power or patriotic ardour when the necessities of the country call for their exercise. A descendant of the old barons of Inverquharity, Commander Frederick Charles Ashley Ogilvy, of H.M.S. "Terrible," son of Sir Reginald Ogilvy, has served with the Naval Brigade in Natal. He was in the battle of Colenso, and was honourably mentioned in the dispatches of General Sir Redvers Buller. Colenso was his first battle, and his gallantry in it was recognised by his promotion to the rank of Commander. About a century ago, the then representative of the family sold Inverquharity. He had succeeded to Baldovan, near Dundee, which is now the principal residence of the family. The house is beautiful for its situation and the simplicity of its architecture. Baldovan, it may be added, is to many an interesting place-name in connection with the orphanage and asylum which were established there by Lady Jane Ogilvy.

Finavon, or Finhaven, near Forfar, is a great name among the castles of Angus. It was one of the chief homes of the Lindsays, once very powerful in the shire. They also possessed Edzell—which, even in its ruins, shows traces of former magnificence—Invermark, and other strong places. The old castle of

CORTACHY

Finavon seems to have been more extensive than Edzell. It stood on the Highland border, guarding the passes through the valleys of the Isla, Prosen, and Esk. Only the ruined tower now remains. Finavon was at one time a royal residence. It was the chief home of the "Tiger" Earl, and of his predecessors and successors in the Earldom of Crawford. Within its walls Margaret, daughter of Cardinal Beaton and Marion Ogilvy, was married to David Lindsay, Master, afterwards Earl, of Crawford, and "in such state," as Knox says in his "History of the Reformation," "as if she had been a prince's lawful daughter." There is a "ghost" tradition about Finavon, that of Jock Barefoot, whom the "Tiger" Earl hanged :—

" Earl Beardie ne'er will dee,
Nor puir Jock Bairfoot be set free,
As lang's there grows a chestnut tree."

Finavon passed from the "lichtsome Lindsays" in the seventeenth century. It became a possession of the Carnegies. Mr David Greenhill-Gardyne succeeded his cousin, Mr Carnegie Gardyne, in the estate of Finavon, and died in 1867. It was he who built the present mansion. The old place of the Lindsays is connected with the South African War through the service in it of Captain Greenhill-Gardyne of the Gordons, and Walter Greenhill-Gardyne, who enlisted as a trooper in the Imperial Yeomanry.

Panmure, in the Arbroath district of the shire, has for considerably more than six centuries been a possession of the family of Maule, represented by Arthur George Maule Ramsay, born in 1878, and who as fourteenth Earl of Dalhousie succeeded to the titles and estates on the death of his father in 1887. The Maules, a family of French extraction, came into possession of Panmure in 1224 by the marriage of Sir Peter Maule with Christian, daughter and heiress of William de Valoniis, whose father had received a gift of Panmure, with other lands in Angus, from William the Lion. The old Castle of Panmure, the foundations of which can be distinctly traced, occupied a strong position a short distance from the comparatively modern Panmure House. It was occasionally the scene of fierce conflict. Sir Robert Maule, the fifteenth baron, having opposed the project of marriage between the infant Mary Queen of Scots with Edward VI. of England, Panmure Castle was in 1543 besieged by an English force under the Protector, the Duke of Somerset. Sir Robert Maule was severely wounded, and the castle surrendered. Sir Patrick Maule, the eighteenth baron, was in 1646 raised to the peerage as Lord Maule of Brechin and Navar and Earl of Panmure. The erection of Panmure House was begun twenty years afterwards, in the time of George, the second Earl. The builders were John Milne, master mason to the king, and, on his death, Alexander Nisbet, who succeeded him in that office. John Ouchterlony, in his "Account of the Shire of Forfar," says of Panmure House, then but recently erected, that "it is thought by many, except Holyruid House, the best house in the kingdom of Scotland." The house has been improved and beautified in modern times. It is associated with the rebellion of 1715, and there is a tradition that the "Old Gate" has never been opened since Earl James, whose estates were forfeited in consequence of the part he took in the rebellion, quitted Panmure to die an exile in France in 1723. From Panmure the Maules have extended over a wide part of Angus. In 1679 they were in possession of Kelly Castle, the old home of the Ouchterlonys. Sir Thomas Maule, brother of Sir William Maule of Panmure, lost his life in 1303 in bravely defending the historical castle of Brechin, of which he was governor, against Edward I.; but it was not till 1634 that the Maules obtained by purchase the lordship of Brechin and Navar. Brechin Castle has long been their chief residence in Forfarshire. Shortly before the Stuart rebellion, Earl James bought the lands of Edzell, Glenesk, and Lethnot, and thus became lord of the old Lindsay castles of Edzell and Invermark. It is said that his object in making this purchase was to strengthen the Jacobite interest in Angus, his support of which proved so disastrous to himself. The estates of the forfeited Earl were bought back by his nephew, who was raised to the Irish peerage by the title of Earl Panmure. This Earl died unmarried. His sister, Jean Maule, had married George, Lord Ramsay. It was through this marriage that the Angus estates of the Maules passed to the Ramsays of Dalhousie. Lord Dalhousie, who represents both the Maules and Ramsays, obtained a second-lieutenancy in the Forfar and Kincardine Militia. He was soon afterwards gazetted to the Scots Guards, and as a lieutenant in that corps has proceeded to the war in South Africa. Lieutenant Edward Maule Young of Lincluden, son of the late Major Thomas Young, and grandnephew of Fox, eleventh Earl, and of George, twelfth Earl of Dalhousie, was killed at Karee in the South African War on 29th March, 1900.

KINNAIRD

In the Arbroath district we have also Ethie Castle, represented in the South African war by the Hon. Ian Carnegie, of H.M.S. "Powerful," who was in the Naval Brigade at Ladysmith, and endured the dangers and privations of the four months' siege. Mr Carnegie is brother of the Earl of Northesk. Ethie Castle has associations with one of the most important figures in Scottish history about the middle of the sixteenth century, Cardinal Beaton. It is said to have been built by him while he held the abbacy of Arbroath. A room in the castle, now used as a store-room, is called "Beaton's Chapel," and his "ghost" was formerly credited with a lingering fondness for the place, as, according to former vulgar belief, the tramp of a foot, popularly known as the Cardinal's leg, was heard at night walking up and down the original stone stair which connects the ground floor with the second storey. But it is doubtful if much of Ethie Castle dates further back than the seventeenth century. The house has frequently been altered. Extensive alterations were made in the time of the late earl. In the course of these, what was found to be a built-up cellar was opened, when there was made a discovery of very old wines. Ethie is a mile from the Redhead. Possibly its proximity to the sea has had something to do with many members of the family having entered the navy. The sixth and seventh earls were admirals. The latter served under Lord Nelson, and was third in command at Trafalgar. The Hon. Ian Carnegie has revived the interest of the family in the naval service of their country.

KINBLETHMONT

Also within the Arbroath district of Angus we have the estates—with their mansions—of Kinblethmont and Anniston, both of which have a connection with the war in South Africa and with the present work. The Laird of Anniston is himself a soldier, and a distinguished one. Lieutenant-Colonel Arthur John Rait, C.B., was present at the capture of Bomarsund, in the Baltic, in 1854. Joining the Royal Artillery in 1857, he served in the Rakamundel Field Force in 1859, was in the New Zealand war in 1863-64, and in the Ashanti war, 1873-74, in which he served on the staff of Sir Garnet (now Lord) Wolseley. He raised a force of native artillery. Both in New Zealand and Ashanti Colonel Rait was frequently mentioned in the dispatches of the General commanding. The Queen recognised his services by conferring upon him the Companionship of the Bath after the Ashanti War, and about the same time he received from its Town Council the honorary freedom of the Burgh of Arbroath. Colonel Rait takes an active part in county business. His only son, Lieutenant Walter Garnet Rait, who had but recently obtained his commission, went with his regiment, the 2nd Battalion King's Own Scottish Borderers, to South Africa, where he died of enteric fever. The Raits have long been settled at Anniston, Inverkeilor. They are a branch of the family of Rait of Hallgreen, in the Mearns.

The Laird of Kinblethmont is Henry Fullarton Lindsay Carnegie of Spynie and Boysack. He received his commission in the Bengal Engineers, in the East India Company's Forces, shortly before the Mutiny. He served as Lieutenant throughout the Mutiny, and was present at the siege of Delhi. He afterwards joined Lord Clyde as Assistant Field Engineer, and took part in the capture of Lucknow and subsequent military operations against the native chiefs in Oudh. In an attack upon the fort of Birwah, one of the Oudh strongholds, Lieutenant Carnegie was entrusted with the command of a detachment sent to blow up one of the gates. A sudden explosion of the powder wounded him severely, and he was invalided home. His services and courage gained him the special favour of his superior officers. Major Lindsay, nephew of Mr Lindsay Carnegie, is serving in the South African war. The Lindsay Carnegies have as one of their ancestors the first Earl of Northesk, and in later times they have been connected by marriage both with the Northesk and the Airlie earls. They are also, as Jervise says in "The Land of the Lindsays," "the only remaining proprietors in Forfarshire lineally descended of the great Earls of Crawford." The first of the Kinblethmont Lindsays was the youngest son of the tenth Earl of Crawford. He was Vice-Chancellor of Scotland in the reign of James VI. Mrs Lindsay Carnegie is a sister of Colonel Rait. She is well known in Forfarshire for the interest she takes in benevolent institutions.

Captain the Hon. Robert Carnegie, son of the Earl of Southesk, and Lieutenant Bertram Romilly, a grandson, are on the "Muster-Roll" of the war. Lord Southesk is the chief of the Carnegies. His Forfarshire seat is Kinnaird Castle, near Brechin, which was acquired by Duthac de Carnegie in 1409. The name "Carnegie" was first adopted when the progenitor of the Carnegies of that ilk (extinct about 1550) and of the Carnegies of Kinnaird obtained the estate of that name, in the parish of Carmyllie, about 1340; the family, for several generations previously, having borne the name "De Balinhard," as owners of an estate thus designated in the neighbouring parish of Arbirlot. Lord Southesk was created K.T. in 1869, and has received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the Universities of St. Andrews and Aberdeen. When he was created a Peer of Great Britain, Lord Southesk connected the title of his British peerage, Lord Balinhard of Farnell, with the ancient and present residences of his family, Kinnaird Castle being in the parish of Farnell. He is a poet of striking originality, an accomplished archæologist, and a highly cultured man. His sister, the late Lady Charlotte Elliot, wrote many poems of great beauty, which are to be found in the published volumes, "Stella" and "Medusa," and in "Mary Magdalene," a volume printed for private circulation after her death. Strong intellect has appeared from generation to generation among the men and women of the Carnegies of Kinnaird. They lost themselves for a time, however, by their loyalty to the Stuarts in 1715. The then Earl was in the battle of Sheriffmuir. His estates were forfeited in consequence, and he died in exile in 1729. In 1764, Sir James Carnegie of Pitarrow, on whom the representation of the family had devolved, bought back the estates. The present Earl succeeded to the baronetcy in 1849, and in 1855 he was restored to the forfeited Scottish titles of Earl of Southesk and Lord Carnegie of Kinnaird and Leuchars. Kinnaird, which occupies the site of an old castle, is a magnificent house of the French chateau type.

Aldbar, also in the Brechin district, is the residence of Patrick Chalmers of Aldbar. The war in South Africa has a personal and special interest there through John Ernest Chalmers and Cecil Wolseley Chalmers, his sons, being troopers in Colonel Plumer's Rhodesian Horse. Aldbar Castle, which occupies a beautiful situation on the South Esk two miles from Brechin, is an instance of the conversion of an old castle into a modern mansion. The estate has been in the possession of the Chalmers family for about a century and a half. Colonel Norman G. Chalmers, late Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders, brother of the present owner of Aldbar, has had a distinguished military career. He served throughout the Egyptian War of 1882, and the Nile Expedition of 1884-5, and in the operations of the Soudan Frontier Field Force in 1885-6. He was several times mentioned in despatches, and received a medal, two clasps, and the Khedive's Star. Colonel Chalmers was also awarded the Order of Osmaniéh for active and distinguished service in the field in saving the life of Major, now General, Sir Archibald Hunter, in doing which he was severely wounded. Another eminent member of the family was Patrick Chalmers, who represented the Montrose District of Burghs in Parliament from 1835 to 1842. He was public-spirited, philanthropic, and a man of excellent literary taste. Chalmers edited a number of club books, and was the author of an important contribution to the archæology of Scotland, "The Sculptured Monuments of Angus."

The castles and mansions mentioned here have some connection with the South African War, and it is for that reason they have been selected for notice. What has been said is sufficient to show that the inmates of the castles, as well as of the cottages and town dwellings of the shire, have not been behind in devotion to their country in what has been regarded as a crisis of the Empire.

"THEY TOLD ME YOU WERE DEAD."

BY H. D. LOWRY.

THEY told me you were dead, dear,
A hundred years ago ;
For every moment is a year
To the prisoners of woe.
They told me you were dead, dear,
That I might understand
Why light of sun and moon and stars
Had left the dismal land.

They told me you were dead, dear,
And flowers were sweet no more ;
God's self could find no gift for me
In all his wondrous store.
They told me you were dead, dear,
I could not understand
Why sea and sky and place of dreams
Were empty as the land.

They tell me you are dead, dear,
They tell me that I live ;
Yet He who holds the keys of death
Alone hath boons to give.
They told me you were dead, dear,
A hundred years ago ;
For every moment is a year
To the prisoners of woe.

SERGEANT-MAJOR BURNS OF THE NINETY-THIRD.

A SKETCH IN ANGUS VERNACULAR.

BY J. B. SALMOND.

WHAT a chield my man Sandy is! I'm sure I micht juist as weel hae been oot in the Free State sin' we pley'd wi' thae Boer billies; for the state Sandy's keepit me in a' winter has been a doonricht scunner. D'ye ken, I've been nearhand dotrifeed wi' him an' his argey-bargeyin' an' ither ongaens. There's been naething but war in his heid for mair than a sax-month noo. I'll swag, Donal' an' me ha'e haen a hankle to thole; we'll be bley'd when the war's ower, I can tell ye.

Mornin', noon, an' nicht Sandy's been at it. He's generally devourin' the papers afore he has his galaces buttoned; an' i' the middle o' suppin' his porridge he'll gi'e Nathan an' me a lang laberlathan aboot koppies an' ither sik-like fyke-facks an' kyowows, an' the mistaks that Buller an' Roberts, an' a curn mair o' oor generals are makin', that wou'd gar you think that gin Sandy were oot aboot he wou'd go hammerin' roond the Boers like a cooper roond a cuid.

An' I can tell ye Donal' has haen some gey days o't when the British got a lampin' frae the Boers! I'm thinkin' he'll no forget Magersfontein or Nicholson's Nek in a hurry. Sandy thrashed him wi' his cornal whups, an' ruggit at the reinds till Donal' got fair doited; an' he bunged the tatties oot o' the scales into the wives' baskets like's he had tint his rizen ategither. You never saw a man in sik a pavey!

"Fine mornin', Sandy!" said Leerie Ethart, as he was busy cleanin' the lamp at the corner o' oor street that mornin' the wird cam aboot Spion Kop.

"Ay," says Sandy, glowerin' at him like a warlock; "a fine mornin' for lazy whaups like you scoongin' aboot at hame when you shou'd be awa' fechtin' for your country. Man, if I'd been twenty 'ear younger, I'd hae clappit a saddle on Donal's back, an' aff to ha'e a peelik at the Boers mysel'. You a volunteer! G'wa back to the butter-market an' gi'e in your breeks an' your bayonet! You shou'd be ashamed to be seen gaen about!"

Leerie was that taen aback, he near fell aff his ladder. "What are you rampagin' about, you cankered wratch," says he. "I ga'e in my name; an' they wou'dna hae me 'cause I was married."

"G'wa! Tyach, man!" says Sandy, as ill-natur'd as a whittret. "You'd nae business bein' married;" an' he ga'e Donal' a wallop that sent him an' the cairt roond the corner like a flash o' lichtnin'.

"What a girnin' vampire that man Bowden is," said Leerie to Swack, oor policeman, as he stood at the corner an' leuch.

"Imp'm!" said Swack wi' a smile that garr'd a' his face an' neck turn like a washin'-board wi' lirks. "He's no juist very perjink in his langitch. But, still an' on, the sicht o' Sandy on that ramfeezled sharger o' his micht fleg a fell curn Boers."

It was juist about as far the ither wey wi' Sandy that mornin' that noos cam' o' the relief o' Ladysmith. He ga'e Donal' a feed o' corn that micht ha'e gi'en an elephant a teenge; an' at nicht when he was beddin' him he biggit the clean strae up about Donal's hurdies till the cratur was fear'd to start till his supper! An' I can tell ye, there was nae jimp wecht that day! The ae scale was gaen doon wi' a doish that nearhand pitched the wechts oot o' the ither. Ye may tak' my wurd for't, the profit o' that day's dealin's wasna ill to spend!

It's a mercy the British didna win every mornin', or, it' as fac's ocht, we'd been roupit to the door gin this time. Patriotism is a grand thing, nae doot. There's nane fonder than me o' country an' Queen—God bless an' preserve her kind heart for mony a lang day! But when patriotism gangs the len'th o' echt-pound to the half-steen—mercy me, ye ken, there's no' a livin' in't ava. But that's nether here nor there!

Well, then, as I was genna tell ye—but there's aye sae muckle to tell aboot that man o' mine!—juist the neist week Sandy was in the backshop i' the forenicht, wi' the Smith an' twa-'r-three mair o' his cronies, busy ootflankin' the Boers amon' the butter-kits, and explainin' hoo he cou'd ha'e timmered them up if he'd been in Buller's place.

"Juist suppose, for instance, that this was a Boer commando," says Sandy, settin' half-a-dizzen butter-kits in a row. "Weel, here's Buller here, an' there's them there. The richt plan is juist to jook roond their flank, along by the meal-girnel there, so to speak, d'ye see, through the nicht; jink up ahint their sentries an' get grips o' them by the thrapple afore they can lat a single peek. Then i' the mornin', there ye are! Ye're in ahint them, an' they've ether to gi'e in or get blotted aff the slate, as Rudyard Kiplin' says. That's the wey I wou'd snod them."

"No' a bad idea, Sandy," says the Smith; but suppose they mibby jinkit roond your flank when you was joukin' roond their's! That wou'dna be so handy, wou'd it.

"I'll no' say but that there nicht mibby be a possibeelity o' them doin' that," says Sandy, gi'en his heid a claw. "But then's the time to left-wheel an' pour in a cross-fire at close range, d'ye know, d'ye see? Frontal attacks is fair murder. The only wey to gi'e the Boers a richt paikin' is to get at them through the nicht when they canna see you."

Weel, Sandy wis jist in the thick o' a tirr-wirr wi' the Smith aboot what should be dune wi' Cronje, when clash to the wa' gaed the shop door, an' in floo Ekky Hebbirn wi' the paper. You see, we're Ekky's farrest-awa customer, an' he comes skelpin' ootbye here like a huntit tod frae the station, roarin' his papers a' the road, but never stoppin' to sell a single copy. He's a droll sacket, Ekky!

Sandy's nose was into the heart o' the paper like a terrier efter a foumart; an' there was naething but "imphms" an' "ows" an' "ays" for five minutes. Syne he suddenly gae a jump aff his seat. "Eh?" says he, haudin' the paper at airm's length, and starin' intil't like's he was mesmerised, "What say ye?" says he. "No' possible! Bliss my heart!"

"What's this noo, Sandy?" says the Smith. "Naebody hurt or killed that we ken I howp."

"Bawbie!" cried Sandy, like's he'd gotten his fingers nippit. "Come 'ere 'oman, an' hear this; What d'ye think? Roddie Burns has gotten the Victoria Cross—presented by Buller at Ladysmith, for bravery at the battle o' Colenso! Loshkeeps, lads! The Sergeant-Major was abune sax-feet afore; he'll be bigger than ever noo!"

"Eh, but Marget will be a prood woman," says I. "She was aye terriple beelt up in her loon, Roddie!"

"We maun go up to Montquhir anes-errand an' see them, Bawbie," says Sandy. "I'll go an' gie the harness a bit snod-up juist this very minute"; and aff he set an' his cronies wi' him. There's nae aff-pet wi' Sandy when he tak's a thing intil his heid.

"Weel, to mak' a lang story short, to Montquhir we had to go—rizzen be't or nane—the very neist day; Sandy, the Smith, Nathan, an' me an' Donal'. A bonnie day it was! The tender green o' the wids was like a drink o' fresh water on a stoury efternoon, and the whistle o' the caller wind amon' their branches was as heartsome as the gurgle o' a bairnie's lauch.

When we landed at Montquhir, here was the Sergeant-Major standin' at the yett, smokin' his pipe, lookin' as kingly an' commandin' as ever; carryin' his seventy odd winters as lichtly as Maggie—that Roddie's little lassockie; she's a fell taed noo, of course—wou'd carry a bunch o' maysies.

"Sandy! Bawbie!" he said, stappin' ootower to meets. What airt's the wind in the day ava that it's blawn ye this gate?"

Sandy ga'e the reins a twine into Donal's curpin, jump doon, an' shook hands wi' Roderick something terriple, peyin' nae farrer heed to either horse or cairt. If it hadna been Nathan, we'd a' been heels-ower-gowrie i' the ditch; Donal's that fond o' a green moofu'.

"An' hoo's Marget?" says I, after Roderick had lifted me oot o' the cairt, juist as I have seen him do when I was a roid young coign, say—ow, weel, a fell twa-'r-three year syne noo!

"Aye haudin' the road an' juist witterin' awa; but naething to brag aboot," said Roderick. "But here she is see!" he added, as Marget cam' hirplin' doon the yaird.

I can tell ye, it wisna lang till Marget had the kettle an' frying-pan singin' on the fire, an' the benhoose table laden wi' pozels o' her ain scones an' bannocks, and bowls lippin' foo o' sweet milk. She didna hain the kitchen, I ashure ye! an' we did tak' oor tea! Haud your tongue! D'ye ken, the fresh air made me that hungry that I was nearhand black affrontit at my ain appiteet. An' Nathan stack in till I was akinda fley'd at him. But Marget was aye handin' him the ither sheed o' breed, laden wi' sweet butter an' grozer-jeel, an' Nathan had a crap for a' corn.

Hoosomever, we a' enjoyed oor tea by-ordinar' weel; an' syne Marget drew inby the sofa an' we got a' set roon' the fire, the Sergeant-Major in his ain big chair, wi' Sandy opposite him, and the rest o's atween them.

"Ay; it's a great honour," said Roderick, reachin' up to the chumla for his pipe, an' takin' a prood, half-waefu' glint o' the row o' medals that hang below his father's picture.

"It is!" said the Smith, gettin' ready his cutty to bear Roderick company in a reek. "Your father wad hae been a prood man this day, had he lived to see't."

"Ay; an' I think this is what grandfather prayed for for forty year, Smith," said the Sergeant-Major. "He is, I'm pretty sure, if no' a prood, a happy man this day, if he kens o' this. An' I believe he does," he added in a voice like's he was pronouncin' a benediction, "though it's aucht-an-fifty year noo sin' they happit him in his grave owerby at Redstane."

D'ye ken, when I was a young kimmer I had aye a feelin', when I was speakin' to Roderick Burns—that was afore he listed an' gaed awa to the Crimea—that he cou'd ha'e ta'en me an' putten me in his pooch. He was that magerfu'; I never met his marrow! The soond o' his voice had a bum in't like the wind in the wids o' the Guynd; an' his big, saft grey e'e glinted as gin a lamp was lichtit in his heid. It's as fac's ocht, d'ye ken, he aye made me feel akinda mauchtless—although a kinder-hearted man never stappit. That's a lang time syne noo; but, wou'd ye believe it, the very same feelin' cam' ower me when he spak' o' his grandfather.

"He focht at Camperdown, didna he?" speered Sandy.

"He focht at Camperdown," repeated Roderick. "An' a weel-faur'd chield he maun ha'e been," he added, blawin' a moofu' o' reek into the lum, an' starin' into the heart o' the fire. "There was fully sax-feet o' him, Sandy; Admiral Duncan himsel' said that Roderick Burns, Sergeant o' Marines on the 'Belliqueux,' was aboot the only man in his fleet that he wou'dna care to tackle single-handed. An' the Admiral—as ye've nae doot heard tell—was as brave, as big, an' as bonnie a Scotsman as ever focht for his native land."

"I mind weel o' hearin' your father speak ofen o' Admiral Duncan an' Lord Northesk," says I. "An' the wey he spak' o' your grandfather was aye something byordinar'."

"Ay, Bawbie," said Roderick, wi' a twinkle in his e'e that reminded me o' lang-syne; "gin my grandmither had been as gleg a hand at the pen as you, she cou'd hae written a scrift aboot her man weel wirth readin'. He was nearhand as winderfu' a character as Sandy himsel'."

"You've been a fechtin' family," said the Smith. "Your grandfather focht at Camperdown; your father was at Waterloo; you gaed through the Crimea an' the Mutiny yoursel'; an' noo here's young Roderick gotten the Victoria Cross! I'm thinkin' there's no mony families in Scotland can brag o' sik a story. What sent ye a' into the fechtin' business ava?"

"That's a story that gangs back to the Mutiny at the Nore; an' there's nane livin' the day that can tell the whole o't," answered Roderick. "If you wanted to rouse grandfather's dander, you had juist to mention the Nore. He used to say that Parker an' the rest got nae mair than they deserved; but he thocht some o' the doited dunderheids at the Admiralty wou'd ha'e been nane the waur o' a bit hangin' at the same time. He got into some pickle ower the heid o't; an', even efter Camperdown, there was a stramush, and grandfather cam hame. His father died within a twa-r-three days o' his hame-comin', an' his mither was left her leefu' lane. The fowk at the heid o' affairs in the Navy made some enquiry efter grandfather, an' were tell'd that Roderick Burns was deid. They thocht it was grandfather, an' there was nae mair wurd o't. But baith Duncan o' Camperdown an' Northesk kent a' the story, an' they were here, baith o' them, aneth this very roof, oftener than ance."

"Michty me! D'ye say so?" says Sandy, gowpin' up at the rafters wi' his moo wide open, an' his hands up like Dominie Sampson. "By faigs, lads; this is a hoose wirth bidin' in!"

"There was some mystery about it," continued Roderick. "My father didna ken the exact particulars; but he aye said it was naething dishonourable. An' it cou'dna ha'e been; for Admiral Northesk an' Captain Inglis o' Redhall—that was him that commanded the 'Belliqueux' at Camperdown, an' said, juist as they were signallin' to begin the battle,—'Damn thae signals! Up wi' the hellum an' into the middle o' them'—baith o' them stood at grandfather's graveside; an' Northesk said to Mester Powrie, the minister, when he was biddin' grannie good-bye, 'A British Admiral, goin' into the stiffest battle he micht ever face, could wish for no better man than Sergeant Burns to stand at his shoulder on the upper deck.' That I've been tell'd; but this I ken—that my father listed an' focht at Waterloo to please his father; an' when grandfather was on his death-bed he said to my father, 'You'll gi'e ane o' your loons to your country, Roderick'; an' that's hoo I cam to see bloody battles in the Crimea, an' wi' Sir Colin in the days o' the Mutiny."

"Ay," brook in Sandy, wi' a pech o' relief—he'd been listenin' wi' moo, een an' ears wide open—"Sir Colin was a General wirth while speakin' aboot. Man, if we'd only haen him ootbye i' the noo, Mester Kruger, an' the feck o' thae Boer billies, wou'd hae been brakin' stanes in Perth gyle gin this time. We've muckle need o' a little o' the Balaclava kind o' thing oot aboot Sooth Africa, Roderick. We maun ha'e some o' you auld 'Thin Red Line' billies reekit oot an' sent to the Transvaal yet, Sergeant. We have Mester Cobb doon in Arbroath, an' Sergeant Jago in Montrose, an' a curn mair, besides yoursel'. I'm thinkin' you billies cou'd timmer up a puckle Boers the richt gate yet, auld age an' athegither."

Roderick blew a ring o' reek in the air, an' his lauch was like the soond o' a bugle. "We've a fell curn grand generals at hame, Sandy," says he, "writing to the noospapers, or sellin' tatties, for that pairt o't. Experts, I see they ca' some o' them. Weel, I'm mibby no' muckle o' a judge; but it's my opinion that the British sodger—ay, an' the British general an' a'—is what he has aye been, the bravest and best in the world. That, as Marget here wou'd say, is the clash o' the countryside in every land o' the earth. Ay, an' Mester Cobb's aye toddlin' aboot, is he?" he added efter a while.

"He is that, an' winderfu' fleet an' hardy," said the Smith.

"Ay, ay," said Roderick, takin' anither look into the fire. "Nane o's is likely to forget that October mornin' in a hurry."

"You mean Balaclava?" said Sandy.

"Balaclava," repeated the Sergeant-Major. "But, man, when ye come to think o't, there's michty little atween victory and defeat sometimes. If the Rooshians had haen anither Donal o' vodka—that was the whisky they drank—that mornin', there's nae sayin' but Sir Colin's 'Thin Red Line' michta been ca'ed a' to crookineeshin, and him sent hame just like Gatacre."

"Bide ye noo, Roderick," I says, says I. "By golly, lad, if ye begin to rin doon the 'Thin Red Line' Sandy 'll be on to Donal's back chairgin' you himself. He has a grand picture o't in the backshop at hame, an' he lectures everlastin' aboot Balaclava to all an' sundry. I'll swag, Sergeant, but you'll better ca' canny."

"Nane o' your ornamental lees, noo Bawbie," says Sandy. "Roderick's richt eneuch. Isn't Burns that says somewey—

Genius frae madness is no' far awa,
There's michty little atween the twa.

"That's in my schoolbook," said Nathan, "but that's no' the wey o't. It's something aboot a thin partition wa'."

"You're richt eneuch, birkie," said the Sergeant-Major to Nathan. "You'll be a man afore your mither yet, my gallant lad. But diinna mistak' me," he added, turnin' to the Smith an' me wi' a wave o' his hand. "I ken weel what the auld 93rd was in the days o' the Crimea. Better sodgers—if it werena mibby an antern ane or twa here an' there—never pulled the trigger o' a musket; although they said hereaboot at the time that we had in the regiment the rakin's o' the Scoorinburn o' Dundee an' o' Croall's Wynd in Arbroath. An' when we left Plymouth in the 'Himalaya' there's nae doot there were some gey like radger's amon's. They were dreeled into grand fechtin' stuff afore Balaclava, hooever. But think o' a line twa deep bein' set up to stop a thoosand o' the best cavalry in the Rooshian airmy. Man, it lookit like settin' up a red-stane dyke to haud back the sea."

"I wou'dna doot but that there micht be something in what you say," says Sandy.

"They cam thunderin' doon like a winter flood in the nairro' o' the Gannochy," continued Roderick. "The growl o' their oncomin' fury was like the rum'le o' hell aneth oor feet; the very earth was tremblin'. I took a bit gley along the line an' saw the feathers in the busbies o' the 93rd quiver like's they'd been shaken wi' the wind. It was the boys diggin' their heels in the turf an' setting their heids like men with the sough o' death soondin' in their ears."

"That's it; that's exactly it!" said Sandy, jerkin' forrit his heid, an' steekin's niv's like's he saw fifty Rooshians fleein' at him. "I've Mester Gibb's picture o't at hame. Man, Roderick, I'd gi'en a pound-note to been there!"

"Ay, Sandy," replied Roderick quietly, bringin' his hand across his broo; "if you'd been there you'd mibby gi'en twa pound-notes—gin you'd haen them—to be some ither wey."

"Ay, Sandy," said Cairncortie, "if you'd been there you'd gi'en the best teeth in your chafts to be back safe up on the front-end o' your tattie-cart."

Cairncortie had come in while Roderick was speaking, along wi' Tillyhiot an' Tympinny Tamson the joiner frae Wardnook.

"Inby, an' sit ye doon," said Marget, as they cam' into the room. "Ye see," she says, turnin' to me, "a' kind o' characters get bilbie in this hoose."

"When the Rooshian cavalry swung aboot to get roond oor richt flank," continued Roderick—for he was back into the thick o' the battle again—"There were a fell puckle tume saddles an' troopers on fit gin that time—Sir Colin wheeled the Grenadier Company on its centre to the right, an' bent back his line till it was like a half-shut knife. The Rooshian General saw that he had met mair than his marrow, an' in a twinklin' his squadrons were awa back the wey they cam', leavin' a gey curn deid an' wounded ahent them."

"That was something wirth ca'in' a battle," Sandy blurted oot, slappin' his hands on his knees. "Lyin' in trenches pappin' awa at ane anither on the sly; feechee, that's no war ava; it's mair like pee-koo!"

"But what I was to say, Sandy," Roderick gaed on, "was this—that, if the Rooshian cavalry had come on—an' I'm no sure but an' extra gless o' vodka the piece wou'd hae brocht them; the Rooshians cudna fecht wirth a diot excep' when they were half foo—oor 'Thin Red Line' wou'd hae run a gey sharpin'. If it had gane to pieces, a' the experts an' backshop generals in the kingdom would hae been on to Sir Colin's tap, and tell'd him an' a' the country what a gomerall he was. It's easy winnin' battles wi' ammunition oot o' an' ink-bottle, Sandy, an' the enemy the maitter o' three thoosand miles awa!"

Sandy saw brawly that Roderick had him; so, ha'ein' naething to say, he took oot his hankie an' blew his nose.

"An' what about the wife that ga'e some o' the Turks a paikin' when they were fleein' through amon' the Highlanders to get oot o' the road?" says Tillyhiot.

"I've read aboot that in oor history at hame," said Nathan. "She was raised at them for rinnin' awa, the cooardie things 'at they were!"

"I saw her," said Roderick. "She was a glib-tongued tague, I can tell ye. It set a roar o' a lauch richt through the regiment to hear an' see her yalpin' an' layin' frae her amon' the sneakin' dogs. I saw her gi'e ae muckle dosent snotter a fung wi' her fit that garred him play skloit a' his len'th, an' he up an' scuddit like a maukin' withoot sayin' a wurd. They said she cam' frae the Gallowgate o' Glesca; her langitch seemed to me to ha'e a flavour o' Lochee aboot it. It was aboot as strange a sicht as ever was seen on a battlefield—a woman lampin' sodgers to get them to stand an' face up the enemy. But the Turks—the very fowk for whose sake French an' British blood was poured oot like water—the damned villains gaed an' robbit oor tents while we were facin' their foes an' fechtin' their battles!"

"The nesty footers," said Sandy, haudin' up his steekit niv. "If I'd been there I'd garred some o' the skrunts chowl their chafts."

"It's a winder to me that oor sodgers gaed on fechtin' when they saw what wirthless whaups the Turks were," said the Smith.

"There never was a wurd o' insubordination that I heard," said the Sergeant-Major; "but when we were hurklin' doon in the trenches up ower the kuits amon' slush, wi' naething but teuch pork an' rum to eat an' drink—an' often mighty little o' that—there was mony a British musket that wou'd hae turned on the Turks wi' as keen determination at the butt-end o't as sent its bullets up to the ramparts o' Sebastopol. The man in the ranks doesna think very often aboot the cause for which he fechts—an' mibby it's juist as weel for's a' that he doesna. 'For Queen and country' is enough for him. Wi' that cry on his lips the British sodger has garr'd the world winder of'ener than ance. Tak' my word for't, billies, he's as fit for his task the day as ever he was in the days o' Wellington or Sir Colin."

"You're richt!" says Sandy, startin' up aff his seat. "You've heard me say that, Smith—

' Their's not to reason why,
' Their's not to make reply,
' Their's but to do or die'—

Ah, Balaclava! Was there ever sic a battle?"

"It wasna a battle," Roderick broke in: "it was a day o' splendid madness. The fey bluid seemed to hae gotten into the heid o' every officer an' man in the field. If Sir Colin's 'Thin Red Line' was a risk, Scarlett's chairge wi' the Heavies was a reckless temptin' o' Providence. Man, the Brigade disappeared amon' the Rooshian squadrons like fox-hunters intil a wid. It wis a winder they ever cam' oot. As for the chairge o' Cardigan an' the Light Brigade, that was the maddest but most magnificent exploit ever seen on a British battlefield. I've seen mony a sodger drunk wi' the wine o' war—it tak's a strong heid to cairry muckle o' that drink—but at Balaclava the whole British force was delirious wi' valour. You speir at Mester Cobb the first time you meet him, an' he'll tell you that half-a dizzen times some o's had to grip youngsters in the 93rd by the cuff o' the neck to keep them frae rushin' oot an' chairgin' the Rooshian cavalry!"

"An' did ye no' see the chairge o' the Light Brigade, Roderick!" I speered.

"No," said he; "that took place on the ither side o' the hill; but I saw the remains o't that nicht when we were oot buryin' oor deid. Ay; there was the makin' o' mony a wearyfu' hame in that day's wark, Bawbie—mony a weel faur'd fellow—baith British an' Rooshian—lyin' stark an' still wi' nane to speir 'Wha's echt him?' If ever I got griet-hearted, it was that forenicht as I helped to bury Lieutenant Abercrombie, as brave an' braw a lad as ever wore a cockit bonnet. Ay; ay!" said the Sergeant-Major; an' he lichtit a spunk atween the ribs an' sat lookin' into the flame o't, wi' his pipe in the ither hand, croonin' to himsel'—

" Oh, wat ye no my hert was sair
When I happit the moul on his yellow hair;
Oh, wat ye no my hert was wae
When I turned aboot an' went my way!"

"Eh, sirce, ay," says Marget, in a waefu' voice; "it maun be a mournfu' sicht a battlefield. I wiss my laddie were hame again to his wife an' bairnies, an' his soord an' gun laid by. I'm sure, sodger's wife an' mither though I be,

nae woman ever prayed mair anxiously than me for the day when, as the auld Paraphrase says—

“ No longer hosts encount’ring hosts
Shall crowds of slain deplore ;
They hang the trumpet in the hall
An’ study war no more.”

“ Oh, but Roddie ’ll sune be back, Marget,” said the Smith, layin’ his hand on her shuder ; “ an’ a gey prood woman ye’ll be. I’m thinkin’ the boddom o’ the greybeard ’ill be turned to the rafters that day. I’m no’ growkin’ for a biddin’ ; but I’ll wad a groat, if I’m spared, ye may lippen to me bein’ here to help awa’ wi’ a donal o’ its contents. Ay, Marget, an’ gin his country shou’d need him, when Roddie’s litlan grows to be a man—an’ may God spare an’ bless him—his grannie, I ken, is no’ the woman that would refuse to gi’e, for Queen an’ Fatherland, anither Roderick yet ! ”

There was a glimmer o’ a tear in Roderick’s e’e as Marget an’ the Smith spak ; but his mooth closed ower his pipeshank like a vice ; an’ I cou’dna help sayin’ to mysel’—“ Thank God, oor beloved Queen an’ country ha’e little to fear as lang as we can breed an’ bring up sodgers like Sergeant-Major Burns ! ”

THE TRANSPORTS.

BY HELEN B. MILL.

MURMURED the waves to the
Old Red Sandstone
Bounding the shores of the old North Sea—

“What is the meaning of all this land-
strom,
Pouring out transports to burden me?

“What is the meaning of all this throbbing,
Heart of a nation I hold in fee?
Why did that maiden go by there
sobbing,
Looking so wistfully over the sea?”

“Ocean, you carry her heart on your bosom;

Carry it gently for her and for me!
Blasted her beauty if now she should lose him,
Dreary the weird she would have to dree.

“Carry him gently—nobly he’s leaving
All he holds dear for his ain countree;
Bear him back swiftly, honour receiving,
Bring him home safe to the maiden
and me!”

OFFICERS IN BRITISH REGIMENTS AND NAVAL BRIGADES.

The Number at the end of the Note denotes the Page on which the Portrait is to be found.

AIRLIE, EARL OF—David William Stanley Ogilvy, Lieut.-Colonel, commanding 12th (Prince of Wales Royal) Lancers; son of the seventh Earl of Airlie and Hon. Henrietta Blanche (daughter of second Lord Stanley of Alderley). Born, 1856; educated at Eton. Married 1886, Lady Mabel Frances Elizabeth Gore, daughter of the fifth Earl of Arran. Lieutenant's Commission, 1875; Major of 10th Royal Hussars, 1885; Major 2nd in Command of 2nd Dragoon Guards (Queen's Bays); served in the Afghan War, 1878 (Medal); in Egypt, 1884 (Medal); and in Nile Expedition, 1884-85; wounded at Abu Klea and at Metammeh; twice mentioned in despatches (Brevet-Major and two clasps.) Lord Airlie's honours include the Afghan and East Soudan Medals with Clasps, the fourth-class Medjidie, and two Clasps for the Nile Expedition. Lord Airlie went to South Africa in command of the 12th Lancers, of which regiment he was gazetted Lieutenant-Colonel in 1897. During the war he was several times mentioned in despatches, his services at a critical moment during the battle of Magersfontein, when he dismounted two squadrons and checked the enemy, coming in for special mention. In the thick of the fight, wherever his regiment was called upon, Lord Airlie was frequently under fire; he was severely wounded in the fight at Welkom on 4th May. He recovered speedily under the devoted care of the Countess, who attended him at Bloemfontein; he rejoined his regiment in the beginning of June, and died a soldier's death in action near Pretoria on June 11, 1900, after taking part in a charge which saved the guns. South African medal, with clasps for Relief of Kimberley, Paardeberg, Dreifontein, and Diamond Hill. A braver soldier or more intrepid cavalry officer never served his Queen. The Earl of Airlie maintained, with great distinction, the highest military traditions of the name he bore, and his kindness of heart and generous treatment of his tenantry maintained other family traditions not less honourable and popular. Wherever he was known, Lord Airlie's death was heard of with deep regret; in Forfarshire it was felt amongst all classes with the keen sorrow of personal bereavement. The one consolation lay in the fact that he had died as, one can well believe, he would have wished to die had it been his to choose—in action, at the head of his men, and with his face to the foe. Lord Airlie was one of Scotland's representative Peers, and a Deputy-Lieutenant of his native county. He was Hon. Colonel of the 3rd (Dundee Highland) Volunteer Battalion Black Watch (Royal Highlanders), and took a keen and generous interest in the affairs of the Battalion. [137]

BALLINGALL—Lieut. Harry Miller Ballingall. Born, April, 1878; third son of Hugh Ballingall, Ardarroch, Dundee, J.P., D.L.; educated at St Andrews, Dundee, and at Edinburgh University. Lieut. for two years in 16th Middlesex R.V. (London Irish Rifles); passed into the Army, Feb., 1899; commissioned in the Royal Garrison Artillery, June, 1899; appointed to 15th Company Southern Division "Siege Train" for South

Africa in Nov., 1899; posted to 61st Battery, R.F.A., 16th Feb., 1901. Served in South Africa from Dec., 1899, till July, 1902. Mentioned in despatches, Nov. 29th, 1900. South African medal, with clasps for Cape Colony Dreifontein, Paardeberg, and Johannesburg; King's medal, with clasps for 1901 and 1902. [145]

BLAIR—Captain Arthur Blair, only son of the late Captain James Blair, Political Agent to the Eastern States of Rajpootana, and nephew of Colonel Blair-Imrie of Lunan. Joined the King's Own Scottish Borderers in March, 1890; Lieutenant in 1893; passed S.C. in 1897; Captain, 1900. Served in Burmah and in Soudan campaign, 1898, under Sir Herbert Kitchener; present at the battle of Atbara; holds British medal with clasp and Khedive's medal. Served in South African War, 1900-2, as A.D.C. on the staff of General Hildyard, K.C.B., commanding the 2nd Brigade, 1st Division; subsequently as D.A.A.G. to the 2nd Division. Selected to take Lord Kitchener over the Tugela battle-fields. Mentioned five times in despatches. D.S.O. Appointed second in command of 1st Scottish Horse, Jan., 1900, with local rank of Major. Severely wounded at Moedwil. Appointed D.A.A.G. on the staff of General Sir Henry Settle, K.C.B., at Cape Town. Queen's South African medal, with clasps for Tugela Heights, Relief of Ladysmith, Laing's Nek, Transvaal, Orange Free State, and Cape Colony; King's medal, with clasps for 1901 and 1902. [142]

BLAIR—Lieutenant Hugh Francis Blair, Lincolnshire Regiment of Militia. Lieut. Blair is the eldest son of Colonel Henry Blair, R.E., and nephew of Colonel Blair-Imrie of Lunan. Served in South Africa, 1900-2, with the Behar Troop of Lumsden's Horse, and was gazetted to the 5th Northumberland Fusiliers on 30th May, 1900. Appointed District Supply Officer and officiating D.A.A.G. to Lord Methuen, and subsequently his A.D.C. Appointed A.D.C. on the staff of General Sir Henry Settle at Cape Town. King's South African medal with two clasps. [141]

CARNEGIE—Captain and Brevet Major the Hon. Robert Francis Carnegie, third son of the Earl of Southesk, K.T. Born, May, 1869; educated at Eton; joined London Scottish; studied for Army in London; passed into militia, 3rd Battalion Gordon Highlanders, in 1887; commissioned 2nd Battalion Gordon Highlanders in June, 1890; gained certificate as best shot amongst officers in musketry course at Hythe, 1893. In command of "Gordon" section of Highland Company Mounted Infantry in South Africa in 1896-7 at the time of the Matabele War; returned to regimental duty, 1897; sailed to India with his regiment in Sept., 1898, and was appointed extra A.D.C. on Viceroy's staff; in Jan., 1899, rejoined his battalion, which, arriving in Natal in Oct., 1899, was sent at once to Ladysmith. There he remained throughout the siege, and took a prominent part in the defeat of the Boers' great attack on Caesar's Camp, on 6th Jan., 1900. With one company of the Gordons (77 in number) he repulsed the Boers, who had gained a lodgment on the south-eastern corner of the hill, through their surprise of the Manchester picquets, and rescued Lieutenant Hunt-Grubbe, who had been captured. Though twice severely wounded at outset, Major Carnegie remained on the field and checked their advance by driving them off the plateau with a bayonet charge, and keeping them back with the rifle; thus for some hours holding the position unaided, till the arrival of two companies of the Rifle Brigade, soon after which his wounds compelled him to retire. Mr Melton Prior's drawing—made at the time—of the Gordon's bayonet charge, is included in this volume. Major Carnegie subsequently rejoined his regiment, and took part in operations in Natal and the Transvaal, including actions at Laing's Nek, Belfast, and Lydenburg, and was appointed Commandant at Pietpotgietersrust. He was twice mentioned in de-
