Academies and Art

ACCORDING to tradition, Nero fiddled as he watched Rome, the Queen City of the Ancient World, consumed by fire. To seek consideration now for a subject so remote from the tides of life—and of death valiantly met—as Academies and Art may appear only less callous to supreme events, because less arresting. What have we to do with such a theme while yet the purple testament of war lies open, and on each fresh-turned page are written in blood the names of innumerable brave and selfless men? Yet clear-sighted thinkers of every age have recognized the necessity to rescue as far as may be the arts from the devastation of war. Unless at each stage, indeed, humanity is to be robbed of its heritage of spiritual treasure, unless veritably man's passion for uplifting beauty is to be quenched, and he is to become a prisoner of life, effort must be made to preserve the continuity of the arts. So far from this being inimical to the duty of an enlightened and patriotic people, it is an essential part of that duty. Consider the alternative. Eliminate from the realm of consciousness, if it be conceivable, that which is contributed to every moment of life by artists in words from Homer to Shakespeare and Milton, from Blake, Coleridge and Keats to Meredith; by musicians such as Bach and Beethoven and Mozart; by great painters and sculptors like Piero dei Franceschi, Mantegna, Michelangelo, Rembrandt: silence, in brief, the ever-haunting spirit-melody of human aspiration, and how dim and sterile, how baffling too, would existence become.

In the turmoil of Napoleonic times, when as now our race had all at stake, the eager spirit of Keats perceived the universe as a vale of soul-making whose vitally fruitful experiences embrace those of warfare as well as of peaceful activity. Within that vale are not the arts as a House of Interpretation, its fabric wrought of the prayers and praises, the illuminate dreams and potent visions of countless men and women? In the most profound sense it is true, surely, that by helping us to cast off "all that is not inspiration" the arts enduringly serve spiritual ends. "Think on the Passion of Christ" was the dying counsel which quintessentialized the soul-knowledge of Michelangelo. Therein the great artist who has been called the Conscience of Italy discerned the mesotheosis of earth and heaven, the reconciling chord between human and divine. Creative alike as poet, architect, sculptor and painter, Michelangelo as engineer once commanded the defences of Florence, the city which in strangely tender phrase he calls "the nest where I was born." Experience so catholic convinced him that the arts through which he strove to reveal himself contribute inestimably to the range and depth, to the vital rhythm of human consciousness; are, indeed, as music amid mere sound, as incense ascending towards "the blest kingdom meek of joy and love."

"The Boche is saving the world, because he has shown us what evil is," avowed a French officer in the firing line. Perhaps nothing short of a cataclysmic war would have convinced us of the fundamentality of his words.

Life was to us a mist of intimations:

Death is a flash that shows us where we trod.

In the freedom—or license—of security we ranged as we would, perforce satisfied to discover a hint here and there of the indwelling spirit of things. War has compelled us to revalue every supposed possession. While courage, steadfastness, devotion, faith, stand firm, ill-rooted views and not a few cherished convictions drift now at the mercy of wind and wave. One important fact emerges as relevant to my subject. In our highly developed and complex civilization, the poignant realities of war to the surprise of many have extended the influence of literature, of music, and, though as yet in lesser degree, of the other arts. Soldiers at the front, men of the Navy, civilians at home: by hundreds they have for the first time recognized that the creatively fathoming arts do not fear "to tread the last measures with humanity," that to the solitary mind they give comradeship, understanding, exaltation. Before he died in the service of his country at Lemnos, Rupert Brooke breathed the melody of his spirit into a pregnant thought, present one may be sure to many ere their souls were released.

And think this heart, all evil shed away,

A pulse in the eternal mind, no less,

Gives somewhere back the thoughts by England given :
Her sights and sounds ; dreams happy as her day ;
And laughter, learnt of friends ; and gentleness,
In hearts at peace, under an English heaven.

The incalculable and permanent value of the arts conceded, what of Academies and Art? Most grandiose of all modern Academies, had it been realized, would have been that conceived by Richelieu in the seventeenth century. His acute and subtle brain projected nothing less sovereign than a European College of Art, Science and Literature, where the chief artists, authors and students of the Western world should, in seclusion and honour, work and live. Richelieu, often characterized as a revengeful despot, was in any case an advocate of invincible authority. His European College would with more or less success have attempted to promulgate universal laws, to be the ultimate tribunal of art and letters. Such an international authority must have put to the severest test many debatable—and some surely abandoned—principles and practices.

Ah, what a dusty answer gets the soul
When hot for certainty in this our life.

Would experience of the truth of Meredith's lines have quenched the ardour of such an Academy's most convinced supporter? In what does Beauty consist? Is it subject to any ascertainable law, and if so can it be analysed from such a standpoint? In the arts, where ever and again foreseen purposes are transcended, is there a right and a wrong, an independent, objective standard whereby aesthetic values can be tested, a discovered or at any rate discoverable criterion of merit? Unless there could be formulated a code of critical legislation based upon a fundamental and generally accepted body of aesthetic doctrine—and how enslaving is the mere thought—the life of Richelieu's College must at best have been brief, stormy and disillusioning. Was, then, his dream chimerical, if only because it implied an existent uniformity of judgment, a stable orthodoxy, which, when we come to examine closely, would at each point imperil vital development?

Assuming, on the other hand, that his Academy could have been firmly established, was it susceptible of that "renovation without end" essential to meet the needs of unfolding consciousness? Faith in the practicability of his scheme involves belief in an International Academy capable of knitting together in a vitally impressive way the seemingly adverse claims of order and free activity, of tradition and fruitful adventure, of stability and evolution. Cultivated intelligence soon or late rebels against the findings of any less catholic, less imaginatively just, court of appeal. To maintain authority, it is essential that such an Academy should not only conserve the existent "good," but generously recognize that which is in process of becoming good; not only subdue revolts of mere ignorance or arrogance, but reverence and preserve the "superior innocence and sensitiveness" whence spring some of the fairest flowers of art. Of such a charter—stated in terms whose ambiguity invites assent—all will concede the validity. Is it probable, is it even conceivable, however, that had Richelieu's dream been realized Europe would by now have found that for which Mr. Laurence Binyon imaginatively says pictorial art is in search, "a single language expressing the whole modern man, the depth of his spiritual desire as well as the changing lights and colours of his material existence?"

Though his European College never took tangible shape, Richelieu succeeded in establishing the most potent Academy of modern times: the Académie Française to which royal letters-patent was granted early in 1635, but not till 1637, after violent opposition, verified by the French Parliament. In the Academy's statutes of foundation, approved by the Cardinal-founder, we read that its "principal function shall be to work with all the care and all the diligence possible at giving sure rules to our language, and rendering it pure, eloquent, and capable of treating the arts and sciences." None can question the justness of the aim thus formulated, nor its clear-sighted, typically Gallic practicability. Yet even as limited to letters—concerned namely with the perfecting of the most living stuff of art, spoken language—has the scheme attained its object or has vitality in considerable measure been sacrificed to order? We know at least that verdicts on the failure or success of the Académie Française have varied greatly. Ernest Renan, himself enrolled as one of the Forty Immortals, pronounced a glowing eulogium. So in our own tongue did Matthew Arnold, who attributes in large degree to the Academy that absence of provincality and of vulgarity, that open-mindedness and precision, which pre-eminently characterize French literature. On the other hand, we are reminded of the number of authors of highest creative power, Molière, Descartes and Balzac among them, who from one cause or another escaped Academic recognition. A comment of real importance is that of a French writer, M. Lanfrey. "If we examine the Academy's influence on the national genius, we shall see that it has given it a flexibility, a brilliance, a polish, which it never before possessed ; but this has been done at the expense to the national genius of its masculine qualities, its originality, its spontaneity, its vigour, its natural grace." Moreover, that master of the mot juste, Anatole France, commits himself to the assertion : "La médiocrité triomphe à l'Académie."

Of such national institutions, in so far as they are influential, can much more be reasonably expected ? Is it not inevitable that soon or late they shall "lose the survey," if indeed it ever be found ; shall codify the achievements of the dead and legislate thereon to the embarrassment of the living ; shall permit the spirit to be usurped by the letter, true inspiration by some arrestingly clever counterfeited ? Fortunate, indeed, if no contracting utilitarianism gain sway, for to such influences human organizations tend to succumb.

Richelieu, freed from what he deemed the darkness of mediaevalism, looked back across the centuries to the earliest of all Academies, that founded more than two thousand years ago in a grove outside Athens by Plato, who held that art is a form of communion with the eternal. Cicero's famous panegyric on the Academic fraternity might stand as the ideal of every subsequent Academy : "Their writings and method contain all liberal learning, all history, all polite discourse ; and besides they embrace such a variety of arts that no one can undertake any noble career without their aid. . . . In a word, the Academy is, as it were, the workshop of every artist." As an epitome of the inevitable discrepancy between ideal and practice, however, stands the subsequent declaration of the Academicist, Polemo : "We should exercise ourselves in business, not in dialectical speculation."

Whether or not Polemo's utilitarian outlook truly represents the later temper of the earliest Academy, history makes plain that, like other institutions, Academies have tended to be inimical to that creative genius which at once awes and liberates the human spirit. Creative artists in all times and countries seek by means of an inviolate symbol, seeming often at variance with systematized knowledge, to unite the external and the internal. They seek the underlying unity in which variety is rooted. Inasmuch as that mysterious wonder, the "genius of the man of genius," is an unconscious activity, the first phases at least of creative processes defy analysis. Indisputably, the act of creation refuses to conform to any merely outward standard. It is in isolate depths of sub-consciousness that each gathered fragment of thought and feeling, of winged aspiration or baffled hope, passes through the alembic of purifying, universalizing flame. The issue is that of three things is born not a fourth, but a star.

That Academies, no matter how wise and single-minded their conduct, cannot do more than gradually scan the horizons revealed by genius is not, however, an argument against their existence. They play a useful part if, with a minimum of tyranny—fortunately genius refuses to be caught and caged—they help to preserve continuity, and save us from unwittingly casting aside valuable parts of our invaluable heritage.

Several centuries before Richelieu's day, and, it must be emphasized, in simpler, more propitious conditions, his ideal of a technical, intellectual, may we not say spiritual, workshop for every artist, was for the plastic and applied arts signally realized. The generally favourable conditions for putting capacity to the test deemed indispensable by Richelieu for the success of his colossal scheme were ensured to members of the Craft Guilds of the Middle Ages. No more vital centres of productive activity have to our knowledge existed. Let it be remembered, however, that in mediaeval times and for long thereafter a common liking for things beautiful remained unimpaired, nor had competition resulted in the substitution of "show" for real excellence. Though, therefore, it would be vain under the wholly altered conditions of modern life to attempt in detail to re-constitute the Guild system, yet from the wise order which it imposed, from the honesty and high standard of work which it enjoined, important lessons for here and now are to be drawn.

Into the complex question of the genesis of the Guilds it is unnecessary to enter. Relatively immaterial is it whether they sprang up more or less independently as protective organizations in various countries, or whether in essentials they can be traced back to the Roman Empire, and, highly organized in Constantinople during the great period of Byzantine Art, were revived as the order of the Arti in Italy, thence spreading northward. The important fact is that by the time Europe re-awakened to the value from the standpoint of ideal life of delightful buildings and objects to adorn them, town after town had become a kind of craft university, daily instilling, not less by practice than by precept, fundamental principles. Theory was not allowed to outstrip performance; indeed, the two were indivisible. Equipped, if not to his own satisfaction at least to that of the confraternity to which he was bound to belong, the craftsman could hardly fail to discover ample scope for his activities, no matter how great or ambitious. There were vast, growing cathedrals to build and to enrich with storied glass and chiselled figures, altar-pieces to be painted, costly vessels and vestments to be made—God to be glorified. Free from the domination of Museums of Old Masters, from the pressure of contemporary over-production, many a craftsman saw his immediate surroundings as, so to say, a clean canvas ready to welcome his “first, fine, careless rapture.” The light, the atmosphere, were those of dawn, infinite in promise. The morning bell, echoing an inward call, summoned the craftsman to the utmost exercise of his disciplined gifts.

Think, for instance, of typical opportunities such as were provided by the building and sanctifying of cathedral-shrines like those of Canterbury, of Amiens, of Chartres. Walter Pater, in Gaston de Latour, evokes a vibrant image of that “dim, spacious, fragrant place, afloat with golden lights,” Notre-Dame de Chartres. “It was a world to explore, as if one explored the entire Middle Age; it was also one unending, elaborate, religious function—a life, or a continuous drama, to take one’s part in. Dependent on its structural completeness, on its wealth of well-preserved ornament, on its unity in variety, perhaps on some undefinable operation of genius, beyond, but concurrently with, all these, the church of Chartres has still the gift of a unique power of impressing. . . . The somewhat Gothic soul of Gaston relished there something strange, or even bizarre, in the very manner in which the building set itself, so broadly couchant, upon the earth; in the natural richness of tone on the masonry within; in its vast echoing roof of timber, the ‘forest’ as it was called; in the mysterious maze traced upon its pavement; its maze-like crypt, centering in the shrine of the sibylline Notre-Dame, itself a natural or very primitive grotto or cave . . . it was such a treasure-house of medieval jewellery as we have to make a very systematic effort even to imagine. The still extant register of its furniture and sacred apparel leaves the soul of the ecclesiologist athirst.”

To see the infinite in all things is to see God, Blake declared. Does that thought suggest a key to the august, spiritually vigilant figures carved by unremembered artists of the twelfth century on the West Front of Chartres Cathedral, to the stained glass of that West Front, whose rich, etherealized colour awaits each morning the advent of God’s life-giving light, sealing with daily benediction a peace of earth with heaven? The figures and the pellucid stained glass—glass at once so profoundly solemn and so joyous—form part of a most significant language to which, as it were in a divinely renewed childhood of the world, mediaeval artists were heir.

The architect, the sculptor, the painter, the weaver, the worker in stained glass—how few of their names have come down to us!—were by a common impulse impelled to unite as complementary members of one vital brotherhood, impassioned by a common aim to seek a common goal. That goal was a glorious unity wherein the endeavours of each, whether humble or conspicuous, should have organic scope. Jan van Eyck, in his "Saint Barbara" of 1437—a veritable poem of activity, fair and mysterious and vital as a flower—images the ardour with which masons, sculptors and other mediaeval craftsmen dedicated their energies to the making of a great Gothic tower.

That this spirit once so common, so magnificent in scope, remains an element of life we surely may believe. As one signal instance of its persistence, has not the architect-designer of the little Thistle Chapel in Edinburgh—under widely different and far less favourable conditions—demonstrated that appeal can still fruitfully be made to that each-for-all enthusiasm, the results of which exceed incommensurably the sum of its individual contributions?

But in what sharp contrast with the bewildering complex of to-day stands the firmly established order to which the mediaeval craftsman had to submit! One entrance door only was open to him. Solemnly, often in presence of officers of the Guild, the lad, his fitting birth accredited, was bound apprentice to a duly enrolled master for a period generally extending from five to eight years. "So help me God and halidame and by the Book," or some such oath, was uttered as ratification of the bond, any breach of which was punished by "our moder holy chirche." In early times the apprentice dwelt under the roof of the master who provided meat, drink and clothing. The lad could attend no festival or sport without license, and he swore "well and truly to keep his occupation and do such things" as his master bade him. He helped in the routine of the household and was in all respects subject to the master, intellectually and morally hardly less than in his work. Implicit obedience in every detail was decreed. We may look at the matter through the clear eyes, the daily sight, of a great artist learning his craft under mediaeval conditions. Dürer wrote of his three years' apprenticeship under Michael Wolgemut: "During that time God gave me diligence so that I learnt well." Does not that indicate the ardour and the sacrifice, the natural piety too, necessary to becoming a trustworthy workman? Efficiency was no mere shibboleth, but an essential qualification for the exercise of any calling, whether classed as higher or lower, an ideal interwrought with the religious consciousness, as, indeed, with beautiful simplicity Dürer suggests. And, with this inward and outward urge, what did he learn? To use his own words, that "the gathered, secret treasure of the heart is manifested by the work, and the new creation which a man createth in his heart appeareth in the form of a thing."

The scope of the Guild's operations embraced directly or indirectly the educational, the disciplinary, the protective. Like weavers, potters and blacksmiths who serve utilitarian needs, painters, sculptors and others who minister to needs as enduring though less material had in the first place to be skilled workmen—honest artisans, if we do not shirk the term. Not for a moment did exalted aims excuse indifferent craftsmanship; indeed, technically faulty products were practically unknown, for the reason that their circulation was forbidden as harmful to the general welfare of the Guild.

If the rule seem rigidly exigent, it must be remembered that for Guildsmen of the golden period the fulfilment of ordinary tasks involved a detailed knowledge and responsibility, a constant experimentalizing, which whetted and kept a keen edge on integrity and discipline.

A few of the far-reaching differences between the practice of the Middle Ages and of the present may be scanned. For instance, the artists' colourman and other specialistic developments have withdrawn from the purview of the modern painter much of the minute knowledge on which centuries ago sound craftsmanship was based. The old-time apprentice was taught to select wood of suitable kind and quality for the panel; to prepare the surface and to lay the ground, prior to the use of colour. Similarly, he had to learn to discriminate between the quality and character of such colours as were available, to grind them and make them ready for use. Nor was this all. He was himself trained to make every instrument employed, such, together with all materials, being rigorously examined by Officers of the Guild, to the end that equitable dealing should be maintained. Thus fostered in practices and precepts of thorough-going excellence—not, let it be emphasized, that merely mechanical excellence which issues in dull uniformity—there was no room for "pot-bellied equanimity," to use Carlyle's bludgeoning phrase.

As has been shown, the first and foremost obligation of the industrious apprentice was to conform to the existing order. Rebellious questionings were not permitted to impinge on that order, founded, be it remembered, on the results of investigation, zealously tested by constant practice. In a word, the authority of the Guilds commanded and deserved general assent.

Despite signal examples to the contrary, we are apt to think of conformity solely or chiefly as weak acquiescence. It is obvious, however, that conformity has value only in proportion, as each step marks a resolve to succeed in an ordered way. In so succeeding, consciousness is awakened that knowledge and virtue gathered by others may be used as a basis for fresh discovery. The apprentice, attentive to the voice of the master whom he revered and loved—as David of Die Meistersinger revered, loved and served Hans Sachs—absorbed his ideas, emulated his methods, became possessed of his standards of perfection. “Grammar” and “style” were not put in separate categories; they were united in one living formula.

Having imbibed all of which he was capable, the apprentice usually became a journeyman, free to work for any master. But in no direction did he find the spirit of his early training violated or abjured. Not yet was there internecine war in Art between the Grand Style and the Naturalistic, between Archaism and Neology, between Impressionism and Representationalism, while of revolutionary excursions by the Futurist, the Cubist, the Vorticist, nothing for ages long was to be heard. In many Guilds, before the journeyman under oaths of fealty to his fellows and his calling was raised to the rank of master, eligible to take part in the conduct of the organization and himself to accept commissions, he had to make and present a masterwork of satisfactory quality. The diploma work of modern Academies derives therefrom. Furthermore, the journeyman was often compelled to extend by travel the range of his experience; hence the Wanderjahre of three years or more, analogous to the travelling scholarships of modern teaching Academies.

Accustomed to the clamour of mutually destructive doctrines, religious and aesthetic, it is impossible for us to recover an adequate sense of such a past. None then promulgated the illusory doctrine that one man's opinion is as valuable as another's. Scepticism had done little towards undermining, temporarily or permanently, the authority of the Church, beyond the scope of whose blessing nothing flourished. Consciously at any rate, tradition in the arts and crafts was no more—but no less—than a lofty standard of workmanship ; not as now a perplexing composite whose essence none can define.

In the foregoing brief survey, obviously from the ideal standpoint, of an intricate and multiform system, my chief aim has been to emphasize the strict discipline, the high standard enforced on the craftsman from youth to age. To some extent, doubtless, individual effort was constrained, though less, perhaps, than we in wholly altered circumstances might expect ; even it may be some wilder growths of genius were rooted out as weeds. Yet at their best the Guilds were admirably adapted to the needs of their time. Specious originality, as over against fine craftsmanship used to image a more or less common stock of ideas, was not then premiated as to-day it is. No true artist thought to hide a nostalgia for the unachieved. It is uttered in Jan van Eyck's humble, strong motto, "As I can, not as I would." Development being along lines at once vital and congenial, iconoclastic revolt against the prevailing discipline did not seem necessary for inward perfecting.

Under the stress of competition and other adverse influences the Guilds degenerated. Emerging victorious from the tyranny of the merchants, the Craft Guilds in their turn became tyrannical. As the volume of trade increased, and greater opportunities were afforded for the employment of capital, their criteria were debased and falsified. A temper of monopoly was aroused, and, more or less at the same time, efficiency and excellence were relegated to unimportant places. In order to diminish the number of fully equipped craftsmen, for instance, masterworks of prohibitive cost and of little if any use had to be executed, and the Wanderjahre were extended to five years. Ideals of integrity, mutual help and public service were abandoned. In a word, the Guilds became permeated with the principle of modern economics, which, divorced from all other considerations, is to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. Since the decay of the Craft Guilds—for in spirit they have no lineage—artists, lacking hardly less the discipline than the protection which they provided, have to a great extent been thrown into the commercial vortex.

The plenary change which took place between the break-up of the Craft Guilds—which were undermined by the Reformation though for long thereafter, shorn of their power, they existed—and the early days of the Royal Academy of Arts, founded in 1768, can hardly be more strikingly marked than by the memorable close of Reynolds's final Discourse, addressed to the students on December 10, 1790: "Were I now to begin the world again, I would tread in the steps of that great master: to kiss the hem of his garment, to catch the slightest of his perfections, would be glory and distinction enough for an ambitious man. . . . I should desire that the last words which I should pronounce in this Academy, and from this place, might be the name of—Michelangelo." Before pupils in the Schools could be so addressed by the President, it is evident that there was no counting on a ready welcome for art from all sorts and conditions of men. Patrons, obsessed during foreign travel by the worth of Renaissance and Eclectic art, had to be indoctrinated with the value of native art. The "burden of precedent" lay heavily on the time; no vital tradition operated. Hence Reynolds, seeking to inspire a new generation of native artists, invoked the art of a master belonging to an alien time and a different race. His professed aim was to recover and remould to existing needs—needs difficult indeed from such a standpoint to ascertain—the secret of the mighty Florentine's august art, created for his own city. Repeatedly Reynolds appealed from the "ignorant" present to the past: "Whatever is familiar, or in any way reminds us of what we see and hear every day, perhaps does not belong to the higher provinces of art, either in poetry or painting." Than this doubt as to the fundamental relation of art and life, nothing could demonstrate more clearly the problem by which the Royal Academy felt itself to be confronted. Moreover, to this day the problem remains unsolved by Academies. Convinced of the efficacy of his ideas, Reynolds declared the principal advantage of an Academy to be that, "besides furnishing able men to direct the student, it would be a repository of the great examples of the art . . . by studying these authentic models, that idea of excellence which is the result of the accumulated experiences of past ages, may be at once acquired and the tardy and obstructed progress of our predecessors may teach us a shorter and an easier way."

How remote and doctrinaire all that seems when compared with the directness and immediacy of the inward call made on the mediaeval craftsman! He—fortunately—was concerned neither to "destroy this vile idealism" nor to question the validity of contemporary aims and ideals, but just gladly and faithfully to add to the world's store of beauty. And in a later, more perplexing period, Rembrandt's genius found its creative way in intensifying and exalting the homely into sublimity, in evoking from familiar sights their essential beauty and significance. Rembrandt's "Christ Preaching" has supreme worth as a final, an inevitable issue of "what we see and hear every day."

More than a century of baffled endeavour has proved how fallacious was Reynolds's hope. True, the Royal Academy, short-sightedly declining to purchase its first President's collection, has not gathered together masterpieces of painting and sculpture; but in public galleries and museums the student has been abundantly provided with models of excellence. Yet the goal of "Universal Beauty" remains as distant as ever: nay, instead of one goal there to-day are a hundred, each irresistibly alluring. In part because of the prevailing incertitude we are apt to forget the truth of words written by Leonardo in one of his Note Books: "Thou, O God, dost sell unto us all good things at the price of labour"; at the price, that is to say, of strenuously and steadfastly exercising every talent, intuitive as well as acquired, moral and spiritual, of the mind as well as of the body.

The Academic ideal has been convincingly and eloquently put to us by a great artist and organizer—the well-informed, urbane Reynolds. Listen, on the other hand, to the "glorious outcast," the assailant voice of originality contra mundum. William Blake, born in London in 1757, served his apprenticeship, strangely enough, in the same street—Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn—as did Reynolds. It is questionable whether he would have found the status quo of any age or country hospitable to his intensely original views and methods. Hardly less alien than the classic eclecticism of the Royal Academy would to him probably have appeared the somewhat exotic ideal set up as a test in the Academy established about A.D. 1100 in China by Hui Tsung. That artist-emperor encouraged subtle ingenuity rather than real imaginative insight. Thus on one occasion artists seeking place in his Academy had to illustrate the following words: "The hoof of his steed comes back heavily charged with the scent of the trampled flowers." The prize-winner painted a rider with butterflies following at his horse's hoofs. A Chinese Blake would surely have held that such hothouse subtleties lack living inspiration. Wrapped, indeed, in their wonder-making visions, whose elements of truth and beauty are too "eternal" to gain immediate recognition, the William Blakes of the world, it seems, can never fit into an existing system. Inevitably they are of those who in the wilderness cry aloud of the nearness of the kingdom, with the solitudes only to echo their cry. Nevertheless Blake would have assented to the classical ideal of freeing beauty from anything contingent, which Academies in general endorse. But whereas Academies have of necessity to lay stress on the value of collective, often antecedent, endeavour, Blake was guided by a rarer star, the star which, shining in his own spirit, focussed, as he knew, rays of divine light. With the unabashed voice of his natural pugnacity and genius, he attacked Reynolds's balanced periods and ridiculed his eclectic conclusions. Doubtless many causes contributed to Blake's animosity towards Reynolds. Temperamentally a gulf divided the two. Sir Joshua, sweet-natured and circumspect, distrusted intuitionist verities. Blake, on the other hand, declared that the man who has "no innate ideas must be a fool and knave; having no conscience or innate science." Reynolds's art was extolled by the age. That of the natural seer, Blake, was neglected—"I am hid" was his self-record. There was, too, a direct personal reason for the hostile attitude. When as a young man Blake called on Reynolds to show him some designs, he was counselled to work with less extravagance and more simplicity, and to correct his drawing. The poet-artist never ceased to speak without indignation of that entirely disinterested and reasonable but—we must not blink the inference—typically Academic advice.

When, however, the personal factors are eliminated—not an easy matter when criticism is mostly a personal outcry—some of Blake's little known marginal notes, pencilled about 1820 in his copy of Reynolds's Discourses, may be cited as representative of genius in a vehemently anti-Academic temper. On occasions he merely relieved his spleen, as in stinging words like "this man was hired to depress art," or when, fixing on some confusion or inconsistency of thought, he wrote "Folly," "Contemptible," "A lie," or "He makes little concessions that he may take great advantages." Then, assessing the generosity of the Academy at "three farthings," he hurled at it from ideal heights the shaft: "Let not the nation where less than nobility is the reward pretend that art is encouraged by that nation." Such and numerous other hostile comments, based often on misapprehension, we may relish without taking too seriously. Disregarding these skirmishes, no Academy would dare to ratify many of Blake's most characteristic dicta, which, indeed, would be asserted to bring not peace but a sword. Declaring the poetic genius to be the true man, the creative and redemptive principle, he wrote: "Passion and expression are beauty itself. The face that is incapable of beauty and expression is deformity itself, let it be painted and patched and praised and advertised for ever. It will be admired only by fools." Again : "The man who on examining his own mind finds nothing of inspiration ought not to dare to be an artist." On the other hand, there might perhaps be hazarded in the hearing of students that "all sublimity is founded on minute discrimination." Blake, in brief, stands forth as the protagonist of divinely given and divinely nurtured imagination, seeking ever to clarify that which is opaque, to liberate that which is in bondage, to eternize beauty. Will some Utopian Academy have a William Blake as inspired President ?

It has been affirmed that in spirit the mediaeval Guilds have no lineage. In a remote and restricted way only are Academies analogous even to those Guilds of St. Luke beneath whose banner in various countries and periods painters first leagued themselves ; nor is the Royal Academy a veritable descendant of the Guild of Painter-Stainers despite the living link of Reynolds's membership. Under the patronage of George III. the Royal Academy was established "for promoting the arts of design," painters, sculptors and architects being elected thereto. But whereas the Guilds embraced all organizations, all individuals, involved in making "things," we now had, to use the opening words of Reynolds's first Discourse, "an Academy in which the Polite Arts might be regularly cultivated." Thus at the very start a radical difference was implied between the Fine and the "not-Fine" Arts. Native Fine Arts—painting and sculpture pre-eminently—being royally approved, it probably never occurred to the founders that the welfare of the Applied Arts did not inevitably follow. Within a few hundred yards of their studios original members of the Royal Academy could obtain furniture at once "elegant" and useful ; and, as is evidenced by Museum examples of to-day, it was the same with all objects from houses to snuff-boxes needed in daily life. Moreover, "The Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures and Commerce," founded in 1754, might be held to concern itself with the Crafts. Unconscious or heedless of the forces at work to weaken the connexion between design and handicraft, Reynolds and his colleagues took it for granted that the then-existing state of affairs would continue. Sir William Chambers, architect of Somerset House—a building, truly declared Reynolds when the Royal Academy removed thereto in 1780, which "will remain to many future ages an illustrious specimen of the architect's abilities"—was one of the Foundation-Members; but it is significant to note that of those who never received Academical recognition were the Scottish architect-decorators, the brothers Adam, ever to be associated with the Adelphi, Thomas Chippendale, Thomas Sheraton and George Hepplewhite. Already, without protest from "amateurs," the fashion of the time classed these men as tradesmen—we read of the "firm" of Adam, of Chippendale, and the rest.

In 1768, indeed, had begun that specialization of labour, that demand for swiftness and volume of production, which, when invention served, culminated in the widespread introduction of machinery, in the establishment of factories removed from public sight, with the result that craft after craft became mechanized. The universal call for things of real beauty, interwrought with life in mediaeval times, soon became practically extinct, save as a more or less exotic and undisciplined if not even simulated development among "connoisseurs." Then set in the full tide of industrialism, which, regardless of other considerations, aims to produce a maximum of marketable commodities at a minimum cost. The arts and crafts, on the other hand, strive after an uplifting and all-round enrichment of consciousness. Despite gallant attempts to restore equilibrium, the pendulum for a century and more has been swinging in the direction of narrow utilitarianism. "Have nothing in your house which you do not know to be useful and believe to be beautiful" comes to the average person as a counsel of perfection. The "civilized" world, indeed, is apt to look askance at energies other than those concentrated on material progress. With this root-problem of the conflict between beauty and utility Academies have not seriously grappled. Conscious, it may be, of an inability convincingly to demonstrate the fundamental relationship between the arts and general conditions of life, Academies have remained content to form little and often rather artificial oases in the wilderness of the modern world. Again and again they have been urged to extend their boundaries, to aid in the endeavour "to turn our artists into craftsmen and our craftsmen into artists." But, aware perhaps of the many and complex dangers, they have seldom dared to respond to the summons. Moreover, whereas for years after the introduction of the easel picture architecture was acknowledged to be the Mistress Art, under whose aegis other arts and crafts found full scope, painting, partly as a result of our exhibition system, has been unduly enthroned at the expense of creative activities no less important.

Various panaceas have been advanced for the admitted divorce of the expressive arts and crafts from the vital trend of the nineteenth century, an epoch of unprecedented material progress, which, paradoxical though it appear, was fain still to preserve the arts as a kind of side-dish. Crude utilitarianism was most strongly entrenched perhaps when in 1855 William Morris came of age. Enlarged and secularized, his neophyte's dream of the mid-fifties haunted him to the end. It was to devote his considerable fortune to the establishment of a monastery wherein he, Burne-Jones, Rossetti and other Pre-Raphaelite friends, following the ascetic life, might organize on a basis of genuine delight the production of art dedicated to prayer and worship. A mediaevalist born out of due time, Morris would unhesitatingly have swept away the advantages which accrue from machinery in whatever kind; would, so he was convinced, have gladly dispensed with every mechanical convenience and adjunct. Morris held that onward from the break-up of the Middle Ages civilization had been following a wrong path, and that, before there could be any true progress, it was necessary to return to the point of mistaken divergence. So only, as he thought, could art activities be rescued alike from convention and caprice, and once more become a natural, an integral part of life activities. In was in this temper that he ardently experimentalized and achieved many remarkable results, as dyer, weaver, decorator, printer. But, is it conceivable that the body politic will ever consent to the attempted turning back for centuries of the hands of the clock? No, assuredly no. How intangible as over against all that commercial prosperity connotes is the aim of again making London "small and white and clean," our country a place of green gardens and grey towers, ordinary life a poem of mediaeval activity. Common sense rightly stands out against such voluntary retrogression. Machinery wisely utilized is not a curse but an incalculable benefit. Well nigh insuperable as seem the difficulties of uniting the apparently antagonistic claims of material progress and the arts, fruitful development must of necessity be along these lines. Call modern industrialism a devil if you will; imaginative reason has to cast the evil spirit out of that devil. Morris, himself by deliberate choice a tradesman, rightly averred that from tradesmen, bent just on profit, art cannot be expected. "Artists" should bear that in mind. Yet

Morris's life-loving nature recognized that beauty, expressive of inwardly satisfying visions and significant dreams, is a supremely marketable quality. Not least important of the functions of Academies in the "dust and heat" of a commercial era, is to stand forth in a catholic spirit as proclaimers of that indisputable fact. Their influence and protection, enlarged to embrace all kinds of vitally expressive effort, would be immensely valuable.

As the earliest and most prominent of its kind in this country, I have alluded exclusively to the Royal Academy. In several important respects, however, its conduct and attitude fail to cover the whole ground usefully occupied by Academic institutions of to-day, nor are they necessarily typical. For instance, though it lies beyond my purpose to treat of the Royal Scottish Academy, some differentiating characteristics have onward from its very inception—as in the stimulating purchase of Etty's "Judith" pictures (vide W. D. McKay's Historical Narrative, p. xlviii)—betokened a truer apprehension of an Academy's functions and educative influence. By admitting even junior associates to share in practically all its responsible activities, the Scottish Academy wills to keep itself in touch with art in the making. Again, the annual exhibitions represent not native art only, but, taking a sequence of years, reflect the progress of art on the Continent. Then, too, the for long neglected "technique" of exhibition—namely the propitious arrangement of the selected works of art—is by the younger Academy consistently practised.

In surveying my subject from the present standpoint it is just to remember what has actually been accomplished by Academies of Art in this and other countries. To Reynolds and to many artists and amateurs of his time, for instance, the establishment of the Royal Academy, under the patronage of the King, did not shadow forth merely "as noble a charity as can be founded" for "sharing the reward" of artistic effort. For them it was of primary importance as a tangible sign, a national confession, of the value of the arts. Moreover, it seemed the one chance whereby the native artist might compete with the foreigner for the favour of collectors. As over against the spontaneous recognition in the Middle Ages that craftsmen minister to vital wants, the very necessity for such reinstatement implies an unsatisfactory condition of affairs. The unassailable truth is, that whereas up to Reynolds's time purely utilitarian and scientific activities had alone been deemed worthy of public honour, the foundation of the Royal Academy was an acknowledgment, conspicuous, and as authoritative as might be, of the natural serviceableness of the arts : a symbol of public assent, as it were, to the proposition that directly and indirectly the arts are essential to the welfare and development of a cultivated people, that they fructify and ennoble human life.

It would be futile to contend that general and sustained edification has resulted. Like other institutions, Academies are in their influence conservative rather than originating. However receptive, they champion in the main established truth, unconscious not only of its incompleteness but, unless renewed by the vital breath of experience, of its obstructing immobility. Thus always revelation knocks at the door of systematized, standardized knowledge. It cannot be gainsaid that from time to time, and, indeed, for long periods, Academies have failed to co-operate with the most enlightened forces available, have sealed with approval backsliding individuals instead of excellence no matter whence it appears, have discouraged or actually banished capacity of an unfamiliar, perhaps startling, kind. Yet lacking such widely acknowledged centres—rallying points in our day for those who combat the forces of indifference and ignorance—would not art activity in this country have been to a greater extent at the mercy of adverse circumstance, might we not have expected a still more unequal contest between utilitarianism, clamant and convinced, and sporadic, ungoverned and more or less neglected growths of genius? By aiming to summon the best thought, perception and purpose of the age, by giving it stability, and—most difficult of all, perhaps—by keeping it inspired by the best purpose and thought of succeeding ages, Academies strive to implant the love of true wisdom, and to quicken its growth. Ernest Renan, delivering before the Académie Française his “Discours de la Réception” in 1879, used words which might have served as motto for this essay. “Où est donc votre unité, Messieurs?” asked Renan. Profoundly he answered, “Elle est dans l’amour de la vérité.”

The Royal Scottish Academy

A Historical Narrative 1826-1911

PART I

A CENTURY OF SCOTTISH ART HISTORY, 1729-1829

ACADEMIES of the Fine Arts are not of ancient origin. They took their rise during the seventeenth century, in response to the need for some other means of imparting the knowledge of the crafts of Painting, Sculpture and Architecture, when, owing to certain economic causes, the Guilds which had hitherto undertaken such tuition fell into decay. Exhibitions of their works hardly entered into the purpose of the Academies then established in various continental centres, and, like the Guilds they succeeded, they were generally dedicated to St. Luke, the patron saint of painting. They consisted of a limited number of distinguished professors of the various branches of the Arts, associated mainly for purposes of study. It was on the model of those earlier corporations that the Royal Academy of London was founded in 1768, though by that date the exhibiting side of such bodies had come more into prominence, if it had not already taken the leading place. This was the case when, nearly sixty years later, twenty-four Scottish artists associated themselves for the establishment of an Academy in Edinburgh "on the principles of that of London."

There is a striking analogy between the events which led on to the foundation of the Scottish Academy and those which preceded the founding of its more widely-known prototype. The "Society of Artists," which held the first Art exhibition in England in 1760, and the "Free Society" which seceded from them in the following year, find a parallel in "The Associated Artists" and "The Edinburgh Exhibition Society" of the years 1808-16; whilst it is only necessary to substitute "Board of Manufactures" and "Royal Institution" for corresponding bodies in London, to find a pretty close resemblance in the relations of English and Scottish artists with that all-important personage in those days, the Art Patron. Going further back, in the Edinburgh "School of St. Luke," the Academy carried on by the brothers Foulis in Glasgow, and the establishment of the "Trustees' Academy" one can trace influences at work very similar to those responsible for the numerous efforts to establish an Academy in London during the century which separates John Evelyn's scheme for the formation of an "Academy of Art" from the movements which immediately preceded the foundation of the Royal Academy.

The Edinburgh School of St. Luke, the earliest indication of a desire for Art training north of the Tweed, though nearly seventy years later, has this advantage over Evelyn's scheme, it actually existed and continued its teaching for some years. There is in possession of the Academy the deed of incorporation of the school, in which are set forth the purposes of the institution, and rules for the carrying on of the classes. It is dated 18th October, 1729, and signed by twenty-nine lay and professional members. George Marshall, a pupil of Scougal's, is President; Roderick Chalmers, portrait painter, Secretary; and Richard Cooper, engraver, Treasurer. The list of membership is interesting, including the names of William Adam, father of the better known Adelphi Adams, and architect of Hopetoun House, and the old Royal Infirmary; of Andrew Hay, doubtless the picture dealer mentioned by Sir Robert Strange in his autobiography; of Allan Ramsay, the poet; and of his son, afterwards Court Painter to George III. John Alexander, portrait painter, a descendant of George Jamesone; the Nories, father and son, associated mainly with the introduction of landscape panels as interior decorations; and Alexander Guthrie, friend and fellow student of Cooper in Italy, also figure on the list. About the years 1735-7 Strange, as an apprentice engraver, attended the Academy, then under the superintendence of his master Cooper.¹ The class met in an apartment within the College, the use of which was granted by the Town Council in 1731. How long the Academy continued its work there is unfortunately no means of knowing, but that it had its effect in directing attention to the industrial value of Design is indicated by the fact that about the middle of the century the Edinburgh Select Society, said to have been founded by Allan Ramsay, junr., and of which David Hume was a leading spirit, offered prizes for drawings of flowers, fruit, foliage, etc., and for the best drawing in which the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders are introduced, to the youth of both sexes. This in its turn led on to the founding in 1760 of an institution having similar aims, which was known for nearly a century and a half as the "Trustees' Academy." It was established by a board of gentlemen appointed as Trustees for the administration of certain funds assigned to Scotland under the Act of Union.

Though public exhibitions of works by living artists had been held for nearly a hundred years in connection with the French Academy, and were being inaugurated by the Society of Artists in London at the date of the founding of the Trustees' Academy, north of the Tweed the term implied teaching only; nor was it till the following century had nearly completed its first decade that annual art exhibitions were known amongst us. Indeed they only then became possible, for till the close of the eighteenth century there were but few artists resident in the Scottish capital. Notable strangers who visited Edinburgh about 1773-6, whilst they have left record of the literary and philosophical coteries they frequented, have little to say concerning artists. But the fruit of the schools was slowly ripening, and on his visit to the capital in 1786 Burns found genial companions in Alexander Nasmyth and Archie Skirving, whilst Runciman and David Allan, pupils of the Glasgow Foulis Academy, were able to maintain themselves by the painting of historic and character subjects. Edinburgh was becoming known as the latest addition to the centres of European culture: before the century was out, Raeburn had achieved a great reputation, and with various painters of humbler talents, supplied the artistic element hitherto lacking in the society of the metropolis. So rapid, indeed, was the aesthetic development that Stoddart in his "Remarks on Local Scenery and manners in Scotland during the years 1799-1800" says "Painting occupies a very high rank; and the general taste of Edinburgh, in this respect, may be said to be superior to London." But with all this some time had still to pass before artists were numerous enough to hold annual exhibitions of their work, and nearly twenty years more till an Academy on the lines of that of London was established.

"The first public Exhibition in Scotland by Artists," to quote the title page of the catalogue, was opened on June 20th, 1808, at Core's Lyceum, Nicolson's Street, then on the southern fringe of the city, by a body of professional artists known as "The Society of Artists" or "The Associated Artists."¹ Lord Cockburn, in the Memorials of his time, says that they were indebted to a humble citizen named Core, who built, or hired, a place afterwards known as the Lyceum, and gave the use of it to the surprised artists. One would gladly believe that there was in the Edinburgh of those days so public spirited a Maecenas to inaugurate our Scottish Exhibitions, but neither the preface to the catalogue for that year, nor the minutes of the Society bear out Lord Cockburn's statement. Both record simply that Mr. Core's Lyceum had been taken for the Exhibition room, and as the minutes record later that Mr. Core's rent had been arrested in the hands of the President and Secretary, the commercial character of the transaction is beyond a doubt. The Society, which, towards the close of 1808, consisted of some eighteen members, was, during the first four years of its existence, presided over by Mr. George Watson, but in July 1812, when the membership had increased to twenty-four, Raeburn was elected to that office, which he held for less than a year, as the Society survived only till the following June. An explanation of its sudden collapse has been given by most writers on the history of Scottish Art, to the effect that the money accumulated as the result of six exhibitions—about £1800—proved tempting and, not being sufficiently restricted by their laws from breaking up at any time, it was proposed and carried at a General Meeting, that it be divided amongst the members. This is somewhat misleading, for, from the time when it became apparent that the exhibitions were resulting in considerable profits, a certain portion of the surplus had been divided annually. The first exhibition, as might have been anticipated from its being held in an outlying locality, did little more than meet its expenses, but those of 1809 and 1810, held in Raeburn's gallery, York Place, having realized a considerable surplus, at a meeting held in May 1811, it was resolved to set aside £500 as a sinking fund; that £100, with accumulating interest, be added to it yearly; and that the balance be equally divided amongst the members. The exhibition of that year having again proved a great success, it was found that after the resolution concerning the sinking fund had been complied with, there remained a surplus of nearly £660. Of this, £648 was divided amongst the twenty-four members. Apprehensive of what such a policy might lead to, Raeburn, Alexander Nasmyth, and some others made an effort two months later to have the resolution of the previous March rescinded, but they were unsuccessful, and the exhibition of 1812 having again provided a surplus, a second division was made amongst twenty-five members.

Some obscurity attends the final break up of the Society, but, though the receipts of the sixth and last exhibition fell short of that of 1812, it cannot be attributed to financial pressure, seeing that, after paying all expenses, it yielded a balance of £285. The causes must be sought in another direction. Some friction had attended the change of Presidents. On April 2nd, 1812, Raeburn had written to the Secretary of the Society, resigning his membership. The letter gives no reason for the step he had taken, but an explanation was elsewhere given for behoof of "his particular friends." From this it appears that a suggestion he had made regarding the placing of two of his—Raeburn's—portraits having been declined by the President, he had thought it preferable to take the course he had done rather than do anything which might disturb the harmony of the Society. The withdrawal of one of Raeburn's talent and standing in Edinburgh society was, of course, a serious loss, and one to be averted at any cost. Accordingly at a General Meeting held shortly afterwards, Mr. Raeburn was requested to withdraw his resignation, and, at the same meeting, he was proposed, seconded and elected President for the following year. This, in spite of the vote of thanks given him at the close of the meeting "for his long and faithful services," was a consummation which could hardly have been agreeable to Mr. Watson, nor would the piece of plate to the value of twenty-five guineas, voted to him at the next General Meeting entirely wipe out the recollection of it. Some half dozen General Meetings were held before the break up of the Society, but George Watson's name does not again appear on the lists of those present.

Raeburn, after hesitating for some time, accepted the Presidentship, and, doubtless, did his best in what he considered the true interests of the Society. The position was a difficult one. He knew that he was in a hopeless minority in regard to the divisions of the surplus, and latterly, even the sinking fund was being impinged on by way of loans and assistance to impecunious members. It was perhaps with the hope of getting rid of this danger that in February 1813, it was resolved, on the motion of Raeburn himself, that every member may at pleasure draw his full share—but no lesser sum—from the funds of the Society; but any one doing so shall cease to be summoned to attend meetings, though continuing a member in some respects “as long as he comports himself according to the rules of the Society.” Within a month or two of the passing of this resolution, several members drew their shares, and something like a stampede seems to have followed, for, at the close of the current exhibition, the remainder of the sinking fund and the exhibition surplus—amounting together to about £800—were divided amongst the members, and shortly afterwards the Society ceased to exist.

This first venture in “Exhibitions by Artists” north of the Tweed was, all things considered, a remarkable success. That the five held in York Place, and open for only two months annually, should have yielded an average surplus of nearly £360, would hardly have been credited, were it not for the evidence of the minutes with their careful statement of accounts given from time to time by the Secretary. A Committee of six members with the President managed the affairs of the Society. The meetings were held first in Poole’s Coffee House, at the east end of Princes Street, afterwards in the Union Coffee House, and, from the date of the establishment of a Life Class, in the rooms successively hired for that purpose in St. David’s Street and James’s Square. The exhibitions were open to all artists, and the number of contributors varied from twenty-seven in 1808 to sixty-eight in 1813. Usually rather more than half the number of works exhibited were by members. Outside the membership, such local artists of repute as Geddes, Skirving and the Rev. John Thomson exhibit with the Society, whilst Alexander Fraser (Old Fraser), John Varley and John Burnet are amongst the London contributors. After the break up of the Society Raeburn and his following, under the name of “The Edinburgh Exhibition Society,” continued the venture for three years longer. As no minute book is available one cannot say with what measure of success, but the decreasing number of contributors and the early stoppage of the exhibitions sufficiently attest that the financial results were disappointing. The strength which comes from union was lacking, and local talent was not yet so plentiful as to stand the secession of the Watsons and those who took their part, now a growing number. This episode in the evolution of Scottish Art has been treated in some detail, partly because of the misleading statements which have been made regarding it, and because it was undoubtedly the germ from which the Academy was to spring in the near future.

The years immediately following the series of exhibitions just referred to were marked by a steady growth in the number and ability of professional artists practising in the city. In the main this must be attributed to the change which had taken place towards the close of the previous century in the training furnished at the Trustees' Academy. Under the earlier masters this had been strictly subordinated to the function of Art as applied to manufactures, but, with the appointment of John Graham in 1798, the Board seems to have realized the impossibility of distinguishing between the teaching necessary for such applied Art and that which goes to the making of professional artists. Graham was allowed a free hand, and being a painter of very considerable talent, the result of his mastership was evidenced in the abilities of such men as Wilkie, Allan, Geddes and Watson Gordon—to name only a few—who studied under him. And, contemporary with this increase in the ranks of professionals, there was a stirring up of interest in Art matters in the community generally. Art patronage became fashionable, and the increasing wealth of the country enabled an increasing number to gratify their tastes. Dealers were finding in the modern Athens a fruitful field for their operations. A writer of those times states that, within a few years, London dealers had sold in Edinburgh old pictures to the value of £5000. Most of these were, according to another authority, execrable; but in an early number of the Noctes Ambrosianae there is the following:—

“Tickler. North! have you seen that worthy original Martin since he came to town?

“North. I have—and I have seen his collection too, . . . rare, choice, splendid. What a Paul Potter! What a John Both! What a Rembrandt! What a Corregio! It is a proud thing to know that such pictures find purchasers in Scotland.”

The outburst of enthusiasm and national sentiment attending on the visit of His Majesty George IV. in the summer of 1822—he was the first reigning monarch who had set foot on Scottish soil since the days of Charles II.—stimulating, as it did, the national life all round, would have its influence on the Art movement. Wilkie, Geddes and Collins came north with a view to immortalizing the occasion; even the great J. M. W. is there on the outlook for some combination of pompous ceremonial with the picturesque features of a city he already knows well. But more than all, the Knighthood conferred on Raeburn during the Royal visit would impress on the people of Scotland the place due to Art in the life of a nation. The bestowal of the honour was popular with all classes of the community, and never, surely, has a profession been honoured in a worthier representative. The pity of it was, that only about a year later, when he had just received an additional mark of the Royal favour—the appointment of “Limner to His Majesty for Scotland”—Sir Henry died of some mysterious complaint which baffled the efforts of medical skill. Had he survived a few years longer many troubles and misunderstandings might have been averted.

It was in a society awakening to such interests that, in the earlier months of 1819 the “Institution for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts in Scotland” took its rise. The “Scottish Institution,” as it is called in a contemporary periodical, consisted of an unlimited number of Noblemen and Gentlemen interested in the Fine Arts, who became members on payment of £50. Its affairs were under the management of a Chairman and Board of Directors elected from their own body; and in the course of a very few years it had more than 130 members on its roll. Its aims were somewhat similar to those of the British Institution inaugurated in London fourteen years earlier. But they differed to some extent. The primary object of the southern body was “to collect together yearly, without respect to names or invidious distinctions, as many of the best productions of the English School as they could display for sale”; and it was not till 1813 that exhibitions of works by the Old Masters formed part of their programme. The Scottish Institution, on the other hand, commenced with exhibitions of Old Masters, and it was only when, after two such collections had been brought together, the Directors, realizing that this source was nearly exhausted, bethought them of exhibitions of modern pictures as a means to keep their undertaking afloat. The resident artists, who had been in a rather disorganized state since 1813, were consulted, and readily responded to the appeal of the Institution, on the understanding that any profits arising from the exhibitions of their works would be used for the benefit of artists and their families.

The first object of the Directors had been the erection of such a building as would bring the Arts prominently before the public by the provision of galleries suitable for exhibitions, and of more adequate accommodation for the Trustees' Academy. The close association of the Directors with the Board of Manufactures favoured the accomplishment of this purpose, and, by a mutual arrangement the Board of Trustees erected the building, now known as the Royal Scottish Academy, from the accumulations of funds they administered, on the understanding that the Institution should occupy the exhibition rooms at an annual rental of £380.

For a while this arrangement appeared to work smoothly, and it seemed as if, in Scotland, the leading Art body might be established on a different basis from that which had been adopted sixty years earlier in the sister kingdom; one in which the artist and the patron might work harmoniously together. But all the while there were the same little rifts within the lute which had rendered nugatory the rapprochements of the Dilettante Society and the English professionals about the middle of the previous century—a mutual distrust as to the controlling power in the management. The English artists, according to Sandby, whilst accepting the proffered assistance of the patrons, objected to their having any say in the management of the proposed Academy, and the movement never took shape. It was the other way about in Scotland. The Directors of the Institution carried things with a high hand. Even when, as an Art body, they were being kept alive through the exertions of the artists, the profession was ruthlessly excluded from membership; and though a measure of recognition was ultimately extended to them by the election of a certain number of artists as associates, that was a matter of policy dictated by the fear of the setting up of a rival body. As the honour carried with it no share in the management of the Institution, or even of its exhibitions, friction continued to increase, and early in 1825 a circular signed by seven of the eleven associated members, setting forth their grievances, and hinting that the formation of an Academy on the London model had been under consideration, was forwarded to the Directors. The signatories were H. W. Williams, W. J. Thomson, Samuel Joseph, William Allan, William Nicholson, J. F. Williams and Alexander Nasmyth.

Within a week the circular was answered in a manner carefully official by Mr. James Skene, Secretary to the Institution, and later in a less guarded but exceedingly able way by Lord Meadowbank, a Vice-President of the Directors. Not content with pointing out, as the Secretary had done, that the Institution was not modelled on the Royal Academy, he boldly expresses his opinion that the principles on which it is conducted were much more advantageous to the artists than that of a body composed entirely of professionals, or even of one in which they share the control with lay members. That is, of course, a tenable view of the case; but on whichever side the abstract truth or the balance of advantage may lie, it was a hopeless position to take up in a discussion with men already convinced the other way, and quite as capable, as the sequel shows, of setting forth their side of the matter.

The establishment of an Academy in which artists should have a leading, if not the sole control, had been a tradition in the profession since the days of the School of St. Luke, and now, with the success and growing influence of the Royal Academy before them, they were not likely to be diverted from their aim by the theoretical objections of a Senator of the College of Justice. There were more serious difficulties in the way. The efforts made to found such a body in Scotland had hitherto been unsuccessful. Brydall speaks of an abortive attempt towards the close of the eighteenth century, and the recent object lesson of the Associated Artists and Edinburgh Exhibition Societies would give point to certain passages in Lord Meadowbank's letter. His Lordship, it is true, had under-estimated both the numbers and the abilities of the local artists, but the situation required a union and a cohesion they had not yet shown themselves capable of, and must have presented itself to the more thoughtful amongst them as far from encouraging. "Revolution," Carlyle has somewhere said, "is always difficult," and it was nothing less than a revolution the artists who resented their relations with the Institution had set themselves to carry out. Their communications with the Directors seem only to have accentuated their differences; but in order to formulate their views and to place them before the profession and the public with any hope of success, there was need both of the courageous and the judicial temperament. They had to deal with a body which included almost all the noblemen and gentlemen of Scotland who were well disposed towards the Fine Arts, associated for the express purpose of their encouragement, and for whose views on the subject, it must be admitted, there was much to be said. At such a juncture, the first necessity was one or two men with sufficient faith in their project to take the lead, and these were found, not amongst the professionals who had hitherto been regarded as representatives of the artists in such matters, but in William Nicholson, a comparative stranger from the north of England, and Thomas Hamilton, best known as the architect of the High School. Early in 1826 a document with a few foundation laws based on those of the Royal Academy, and in which it was proposed to found a Scottish Academy, was handed round for signature by Mr. Nicholson. Twenty-four signatures were obtained, thirteen as Academicians and eleven as Associates. The names were as under :

In addition to the professional membership the scheme of the Academy made provision for an Honorary Membership to consist of Donors and Subscribers who, according to the sums contributed, were more or less closely associated with the Academy.

The first meeting of the newly-formed body was held on May 27th. Mr. Patrick Syme occupied the chair, and the Officials and Council for the year were elected as follows :

President—George Watson.

Secretary—William Nicholson.

Treasurer—Thomas Hamilton.

Council—Thomas Hamilton, William Simson, James Stevenson, Patrick Syme.

* Those so marked withdrew from membership before the date of the first exhibition.

¹ Or D. M. ; once, at least, referred to in the minutes as D. Maitland MacKenzie.

The first Meeting of Council was held on June 3rd, 1826, Hamilton, Stevenson, Syme and the Secretary being present. At that, and at two subsequent meetings of dates 10th and 17th June, the business was mainly the revision and amendment of a statement of the affairs of the Academy, with a view to its being printed and circulated. This statement was the document which had been handed round by Nicholson earlier in the year. Strict privacy was enjoined on all members during the process of revision, and at a General Meeting held on June 24th, it was adopted with some slight alterations: after which, to quote the minutes, "the Meeting resolved that the statement should be printed and sent to the Directors and Members of the Institution for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts in Scotland, with an accompanying letter."

At this Meeting Mr. John Elder, W.S., was appointed the Academy's Law Agent, and Messrs. Thomas Kinnear & Sons their Bankers. So the gage of battle was thrown down, and two days later the Council in a somewhat reckless and extravagant mood ordered four hundred copies of their statement to be printed "on the best wove paper, hotpressed, with gilt edges." It may be noted that though George Watson presided at the General Meeting and signed the letter to the Institution, he was present at none of the Council Meetings about this time.

From the list of those who now formed the infant Academy the names of seven of the artists associated with the Institution are missing, including those of Alexander Nasmyth, H. W. Williams, William Allan and W. J. Thomson. These had no doubt been regarded as amongst the most likely to favour the new movement, and they were personally waited on with a view to inducing them to sign the document. But their courage, as evinced in the letter addressed to the Directors of the Institution in the February of the previous year, seems to have failed them, and though one and all wished success to the undertaking, for one reason or another they declined to become members. This must have been a severe disappointment to the leaders of the forward policy, for those "ready-to-halts" were men of standing, both as artists and citizens, and their co-operation would have been of great value to the young Academy. But there was no crying over spilt milk. According to their statement just issued, one of the aims of the Academy was the obtaining of a Royal Charter, and within a month of the General Meeting we find the Council, in the midst of their preparations for the first Exhibition, instructing their agent "to prepare the petition to His Majesty along with a draft of the charter." Much depended on the success of the Exhibition, and it was necessary to make definite arrangements which could be advertised in good time. Besides the Institution's rooms there seem to have been only two places available for public exhibitions in the Edinburgh of those days—the great gallery of the house built by Raeburn in York Place, already referred to, and the rooms at 24 Waterloo Place, where the Institution had held their exhibitions since 1821. As these had just been transferred to the new galleries on the Mound, negotiations were opened with the owners of the rooms vacated, which were taken for twelve weeks at a rental of eighty guineas.¹ But much was to happen during the intervening months.

At the outset of this narrative attention was drawn to a certain similarity in the events which led on to the formation of the Royal and the Scottish Academies. With their coming into existence the analogy ceases. In England, largely through the tactful guidance of Sir William Chambers, His Majesty's Architect and Surveyor-General, the King—George III.—was approached and his patronage obtained for the proposal submitted to him by the artists. So interested was the young monarch, that he immediately adopted the Academy as his own, endowed it with a local habitation in one of his palaces, and conferred the honour of Knighthood on Reynolds, the President elect. Not content with these marks of the Royal favour, he munificently engaged to supply out of his privy purse any deficiency in its funds which might arise out of the exercise of its academic functions. The Royal Academy was, so to speak, born in the purple. Far other was the lot of the northern artists. The profession was still divided, and amongst the twenty-four who now formed the Scottish Academy there were not a few waverers. They were confronted by a rival body which had at its command the whole official influence of the country; and though this did not prevent the Academy's applying for a Royal Charter and the patronage of the King, their efforts were for many years unavailing. But a more serious danger was threatening. At a meeting held on December 22nd, we read that the Council accepted the resignations of two Academicians, Mr. J. F. Williams and Mr. W. Simson. This is followed at a short interval by the still more sinister announcement that seven Associates had sent in their resignations, viz. Kenneth Macleay, Wm. Miller, E. T. Crawford, John Horsburgh, George Simson, D. O. Hill and Robert Gibb. Here was a staggering blow to a body whose chances of success were none too bright to begin with; two of their thirteen Academicians gone, and their Associate list practically extinguished. With the Exhibition advertised to open within a few weeks, and the obligations it entailed, one cannot but admire the courage of the fifteen who remained faithful in persevering with the work they had entered upon. But to fully understand the situation it is necessary to consider what the Directors of the Institution had been doing to combat the revolt of the professionals.

As already stated, they had met the growing dissatisfaction by the election of eleven artists to Associate Membership in 1824, and the number was considerably increased before the date of the Academy's first Exhibition. But something more than such empty honours was necessary to allay the discontent. We find accordingly, in a statement of the objects of the Institution prefixed to their catalogue of February 1826, that amongst these are "the purchase of works by Modern Artists," with a view to founding a permanent collection; "the offering of premiums for competition"; and "the securing the means of affording relief to any artist suffering under any unavoidable reverse of circumstances, or to their families, when deprived by death of the benefit of their talents and exertions." Here was a bait sufficiently attractive to shake the allegiance of all but the staunchest supporters of the new movement. That it had not been without effect is evident from the advertisement of the Institution's Exhibition of 1827, quoted by Sir George Harvey in his "Notes," in which the Directors state that "having observed in the Scotsman of January 3rd curt. that the Associated Artists intended having an Exhibition of their own early in February, they had obtained the promise of nine of the said artists, not only to send their works to the Institution's Exhibition, but to make the utmost exertions to give it every support in their power." "And," adds Harvey, "to keep up the spirits of their adherents, the Directors proceeded to give commissions of £50 and upwards to each of the consenting Associates."

Such were the depressing circumstances under which the remnant of fifteen—strengthened only by the recent election of Mr. W. H. Lizars, Engraver, to the Associateship—opened their first Exhibition in February 1827. This they do in no despondent mood, if one may judge from the statement annexed to their catalogue; but rather in the spirit of the Latin motto which adorns its title page—"Major rerum mihi nascitur ordo." After the inevitable quotation from Reynolds's Discourses, the Council proceed to set forth in a preface of four quarto pages the aims of the new body, and the motives which had led to its establishment. In conclusion the Scottish Academy throws itself with confidence on the patronage of an enlightened public to enable it to realize the important objects which its plan embraces. The Exhibition contained two hundred and eighty-two works, contributed by sixty-seven artists. That more than half of these were provided by members shows that there was no lack of zeal amongst what remained of the Academy. The Secretary's contributions number no fewer than twenty-eight, J. B. Kidd sends sixteen, whilst Ewbank and Smellie Watson are responsible for thirteen each. Of the seventeen works by which Sculpture is represented, Samuel Joseph contributes twelve, all bust portraits. Hamilton with four designs, two of them connected with his great work, the High School, has almost a monopoly of the Architectural section. The President, mindful perhaps of a former experience, keeps on the safe side with five portraits, a study of a head, and a picture entitled "The Hermit." Loan works are conspicuous by their absence, and there are few contributions from south of the border. In making its debut the young Academy has had to be self dependent, with the assistance only of a precarious fringe of local talent, and Harvey in his "Notes" is constrained to admit that, "so far as the excellence of the paintings was concerned," the Institution's contemporary Exhibition had the best of it. The financial result was disappointing, the receipts being £351¹ as against disbursements to the amount of £490. Luckily the position was saved by a sum of over £450 received from donors and subscribers. But even so, considering that the extra revenue was mostly from life payments, the balance was a poor one with which to face the future.

Till towards the close of 1828 the minutes make little reference to the Exhibitions. The Council's whole energy seems to have been given to the longed-for Charter, if one may judge from the volume of correspondence addressed to Sir Thomas Lawrence, Mr. Peel, the Lord Advocate and others, either directly by the President or through the Academy's law agent. Hopeful reference to the progress of the negotiations is made from time to time, and the official intimation of the rejection of their petition, which reached them in July 1828, must have been embittered by the knowledge that their failure was due, not to the London authorities—who were inclined to be favourable—but to the position taken up by the Lord Advocate. The Council could hardly fail to read into this decision some wire-pulling of their rivals, on whom the coveted honour had for some time been conferred. But to any one interested in the annals of the Academy it is a relief to get the matter out of the way, even for a year or two, as the minutes have so far presented little other variety than the election of Honorary Members, of whom there are quite a respectable number before the close of 1828.¹ The list is headed by the name of J. J. Audubon, the famous American naturalist, who seems, indeed, to have desired election to professional membership.² The Academy's first Report, read at the Second Annual General Meeting in November 1828, deals with a period of more than two years. In spite of their disappointment in the Charter business and a financial prospect not much brightened by the result of their second Exhibition, the Council face the position boldly, and look forward to a third year of better things. The Report concludes with a brief account of the proceedings in connection with the application for a Charter, in which the position taken up by the Royal Institution and the Lord Advocate³ is severely and ably dealt with.

In their contemporary Exhibitions the Institution had more than held their own. For the critical one of 1827 their Associate Members were as good as their word, and gave it every support in their power, the contributions of one of them, H. W. (Grecian) Williams, exceeding by one those of the enthusiastic Nicholson to the collection in Waterloo Place. In local talent the Institution had easily the best of it, whilst, in the sketch for Wilkie's famous "Chelsea Pensioners" they had an attraction to which the Academy had nothing to oppose; and though in the following year the Exhibitions were more equally matched, in those opening rounds of the contest the honours of victory must be awarded to the Institution. Nor could the most sanguine supporters of the younger body have anticipated the dramatic reversal of positions another year was to bring about.

³ Sir William Rae.

The Exhibitions are, of course, discussed in the Noctes. After reference, more or less lengthy, to the works of the recognized leaders at the Mound, The Shepherd strikes in :

“ But hae ye been at the opposition Exhibition—they tell me it’s capital.—Can that be true ? And what for did the painters cast out among themselves, and whence a’ this cabawl ? ”

North.—“ It’s a lang story that, James, and might be tedious.”

Notwithstanding which, the story of their quarrel and reconciliation must be told to its close.

The causes of the unexpected turn in the Academy’s affairs were two, the fact that the discontent amongst the artists associated with the Institution had been patched up, not removed, and the spirited action of the Council of the Academy in connection with their third Exhibition. It is a pleasure to pass from the endless Charter correspondence and the altercations with the Institution—from what may be termed the politics of Art—to an episode which shows the leaders of the Academy in their true sphere as artists. All the circumstances associated with the contemporary development of Scottish Art show the admiration in which the northern professionals held the Royal Academy. They regarded it as a model of perfection, and, in their constitution and laws, they followed it with an almost slavish imitation. Though not without its internal cliques and jealousies, the Institution founded sixty years before, under such happy auspices, had drawn to its ranks almost all that was best in English Art of the later eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries ; and the ready inclusion of Raeburn in its membership, with the more recent recognition of the genius of Wilkie, had made its annual Exhibition a place of pilgrimage to such Scottish artists as could afford the expenses of the journey ; no trifle in those days. The great school of portraiture which had been a feature of the first half century of its existence, was on the wane, though its tradition was not unworthily continued by the President, Lawrence. Turner and Constable had given new life to native landscape painting, whilst in historical and figure subjects, the classicism of West and Copley was yielding to a more intimate and natural treatment of historic and domestic incident. Benjamin Haydon from without was fulminating against the Academy’s neglect of “ High Art,” and, as the term had been understood by the two preceding generations, its representatives within the body were certainly a diminishing quantity. But one there was who interpreted the words differently. William Etty aspired to add to the qualities of design and chiaroscuro always associated with the grand style, the glowing colour of Venice and Antwerp which, strangely enough, had for a hundred years been thought a hindrance to the highest attainment. Now over forty, he had, only a year or two previously, been elected to the Associateship of the Academy. Latterly his progress had been rapid, and amongst painters he was being hailed as a modern Titian, though material success still lingered. That the leaders of the Scottish Academy had noted the work of the great colourist, and were alive to its significance, is attested by a correspondence, towards the close of 1826, between the Secretary and John Martin, who had purchased Etty's picture "The Combat," exhibited at Somerset House the year before. Nicholson's object had been to secure the picture on loan for the Scottish Academy's first Exhibition, a request which the owner had regretfully declined owing to difficulties of packing and transport. But the enthusiasm of the Council was not to be stifled by a first rebuff. When, two years later, "Judith and Holofernes" was returned from the Royal Academy unsold, the Scottish artists were on the alert, and towards the end of the year, we find them urging the painter to send it to their approaching Exhibition. But Etty, like Martin, could not see his way to face the difficulties and risks of the long transport, even though the Academy had offered to pay all expenses in connection therewith. He had resolved besides to give the work another chance in London, and sent it to the British Institution's Exhibition of 1828. The picture having fared no better there, the persistent Scotsmen returned to the attack, the Council proposing, after some interchange of letters, that Mr. Etty should send the picture to their ensuing Exhibition for sale, and offering, in the event of its remaining unsold, to purchase it at a figure which they hope he will be disposed to accept. No sum is named—there having been no time to call a meeting—but the Council guarantee two hundred guineas. This they acknowledge is far below the value of the work, but they plead the infant state of the Academy, and the responsibility which attaches to their situation, as preventing them from naming a higher amount without the concurrence of the general body. Within a few days Nicholson's letter draws from Mr. Etty a reply delightfully characteristic at once of the artist and the man. He is filled with admiration at the motives which have prompted the Council of so young an institution, struggling for very existence, to make such a generous offer ; but he feels that he would be doing both his picture and himself as an artist too great an injustice by accepting such a reduction on the price asked during its exhibition. After mentioning three hundred guineas without the frame as the lowest sum he would be inclined to accept, he goes on to speak of the "Judith" having been intended for the central piece of a tryptich, and to show his appreciation of the offer made by the Scottish artists, he expresses his willingness to complete the design by painting for them the two adjuncts at a hundred guineas each; this, he adds, would greatly enhance its interest and impression. Finally he submits three alternatives, viz. :

"To take the picture, and if not sold during the Exhibition, that 300 guineas be paid me for it at the close."

"To wait till the adjuncts are completed, about next Christmas, on the delivery of which I should expect the sum of 500 guineas."

"Or thirdly, to decline the matter altogether, as ineligible and impracticable."

On the very day of the receipt of Etty's letter, Nicholson having submitted it to the Council, replies conveying to the artist "their warmest thanks for his extremely liberal and disinterested offer—an offer which nothing but your devotion to the arts could have prompted." "It is therefore," he continues, "with the utmost readiness that the Council, in name of the Scottish Academy, close with your proposal, and consider themselves highly fortunate in securing a picture which will serve as a study, both to their own members and to other artists." The agreement is that the Academy purchase the three pictures, "Judith" at 300, and the pendants at 100 guineas each. In his acknowledgment Etty expresses his gratification, and that of all his artist friends to whom he had mentioned it, at the prompt and manly spirit which had dictated the resolution of the Council, and, that it may be in time for the approaching Exhibition, he immediately busies himself with the packing and forwarding of the picture. The rising fame of the painter and the circumstances of its acquirement made "Judith" the great attraction of the Academy's third Exhibition, though towards its close, it had a formidable, if not quite legitimate rival in Rubens' "Adoration of the Shepherds" lent by Lord Hopetoun, the introduction of which to the galleries is so graphically described by Sir George Harvey in his "Notes."¹ Letters intimating the enthusiasm with which "Judith" had been received in Edinburgh, and concerning the completion of the adjuncts continue to pass between Etty and Nicholson, with assurances on the part of the former of his "deep desire to render all that I may do for my brethren, the Scottish artists, worthy of them and of my country." The situation is referred to in the annual discussion on the Fine Arts at Ambrose's tavern. "The opposition is strong this year," remarks Tickler, "reinforced by Etty, Linton and Martin," whilst the Shepherd goes into ecstasies over the "Judith." On its material side the result was a rise of about £300 in the Academy's income. This interesting episode has a sequel which will be dealt with later.

But the attractiveness of a single year's Exhibition could never have permanently affected the relationship of the rival bodies. The policy of purchasing and borrowing notable works of art was open to the Institution as well as to the Academy, and the wealthier and more influential society was obviously the more favourably situated in this respect. That the Directors of the Institution were alive to this aspect of Art Exhibitions their catalogues give evidence, and with Wilkie's "Penny Wedding" lent by His Majesty the King for that of 1829 they had an attraction which, to the Scottish public, would rival that of the Etty and Rubens at Waterloo Place. The exhibiting of Old Masters amongst works by living artists seems never to have occurred to them, but if that was to be the rôle, it is difficult to see how the Academy could have survived the competition. Though the spirit shown by their Council in this matter undoubtedly raised the weaker body in public estimation, the undoing of the Institution was due to the continued discontent amongst their artist associates. The waverers had been lured back from the new venture, and hopes had been dangled before them of some official recognition in the Charter which the Directors must have known was likely to come their way. When, therefore, the Royal document appeared without any mention of them, it was felt by the professionals that the time for some decided step had arrived. Their position was a difficult one. To go, cap in hand, and sue for admission to the ranks of a body inferior both in numbers and ability, and from which a considerable section of them had recently backed out, was not to be thought of. On the other hand, the establishment of a rival academy was a policy of despair. But to that it might have come had not the better way of reversing the case of the famous "family group" in the Vicar of Wakefield, its dimensions prevented its admission by the usual means; and it was only through the practical skill of Mr. Hamilton that it was ultimately introduced to the galleries by the removal of the cupola.

compromise been found and followed. As we have been frequently reminded—by Cromwell amongst others—the spirit of compromise is not a national failing, and it is all the more creditable to those concerned that a conspicuous example of it should come from the members of a profession which has its full share of the perfervid characteristics of their countrymen.

The Academy were, of course, aware of what was going on amongst their brethren at the Mound, and for them as well as for their rivals it must have been an anxious time. They had to play a waiting game, of doubtful issue. Early in the year three associates had been added to their ranks, including one of the backsliders of 1827; but a pointed appeal to the dissatisfied artists in the form of an intimation that there were still eight vacancies, four in each rank, met with no response. It must, therefore, have been with a sense of relief that the suggestion of compromise, from whichever side it first came, was received at Waterloo Place. Indeed, it is hardly possible to overstate the debt of Scottish Art to the unknown proposer of the via media. The way bristled with difficulties, but fortunately men capable of dealing with it were not wanting.

Of the Institutions left to us at the Union of Parliaments the Supreme Court of Justice has best represented—on the secular side at least—the individuality of Scotland as part of a united Kingdom and Empire. When so much of the old order was superseded or went south with our parliamentary representatives, the Court of Session insured to Edinburgh, in the membership of its Bench and Bar, a certain number of citizens in whom the judicial faculty was highly developed. Fortunately, there have always been amongst our Judges and Advocates not a few, whose patriotism and public spirit have inclined them to give the benefit of their trained faculties to whatever seemed to make for the good of the country or of the city. In their dilemma the artists associated with the Institution, by some happy inspiration, sought the advice of Mr. Henry Cockburn, afterwards well known as Lord Cockburn, who, in a letter dated June 6th, made application on their behalf, and on behalf of a few artists unconnected with either body, which raised the number to twenty-four, for admission to the Academy. If it is the first step which counts, as the proverb has it, to the artists of the Institution must be given the credit of making the first advance. The Academy, after some manœuvring for position, responded in a conciliatory spirit, and were equally ready to leave their interests in the hands of Mr. Hope, the Solicitor-General. It is unnecessary to give a detailed narrative of the union, and of the embarrassments it involved, which might well have proved insoluble had the two parties not had the wisdom to intrust themselves to the guidance of Mr. Cockburn and Mr. Hope. The award of those two eminent lawyers on a position so delicate is a model of skill and tact, and through it the seemingly impossible—the addition of a body more numerous and talented than themselves to the ranks of the Academy—became an accomplished fact. To quote Lord Cockburn—"This for a while threatened to be impossible, till the one party referred it all to the Solicitor-General and the other party to me; and we married them in a week." The main difficulty was got over by the bold device of abolishing the associateship for the time being, with a provision that one election to the senior rank be made for every three vacancies till the number of Academicians shall be reduced to thirty; fifteen¹ being suggested as the number of the future associate rank. The award was unanimously accepted and a motion for union carried at a General Meeting held on July 10th, 1829.

The union thus happily completed brought about a total change in the relations of the Academy with the Royal Institution. On the one hand there was now a compact phalanx of forty-two artists, in place of the fifteen or sixteen who had hitherto fought against such odds; on the other, the array of one hundred and thirty-four subscribers, noblemen and gentlemen, with some dozen and a half Honorary Members, lay and professional; a seemingly formidable body but, as an organization for the exhibition of works of living artists—the rôle they had adopted since 1821—quite powerless in face of the recent combination of their opponents. After one more attempt in that direction during the following spring, the Directors returned to the object for which the Institution had been originally founded—the showing from time to time of such works by the Old Masters as could be got together from the collections or through the influence of its members. Such Exhibitions were held in 1831 and annually from 1834 to 1837, but from that date, with a waning membership, the Royal Institution was practically defunct.

One cannot but regret this, for with a little more of the tact by means of which Cockburn and Hope reconciled the differences of the Academy with the Associated Artists, there might have been a sphere of usefulness for a body so numerous and powerful as the Royal Institution. That more than a hundred and thirty Scottish noblemen and gentlemen were so deeply interested in the Fine Arts as to subscribe fifty pounds each for the privilege of belonging to such an Association is a remarkable circumstance in the development of a country so recently brought within the sphere of aesthetic culture. The Institution's most notable achievement was the purchase of some forty works by the Old Masters, made in many cases under the guidance of Mr. Andrew Wilson. The collection, which now forms part of the National Gallery of Scotland, includes several fine examples of Vandyck, with specimens of Titian, Tintoretto, Bassano and others. What was accomplished in so short a time is an indication of what might have been done had the Institution developed on the lines of the recent "National Collections" or "Scottish Modern Arts" associations.

Before proceeding with the narrative of the re-constituted Academy it might be well to glance briefly at the new conditions which gave promise to it of a successful future.

There had been a remarkable advance in the position held by Art in the Scottish metropolis since the beginning of the century. The close of the eighteenth showed little change from the days when travellers like Johnson and Topham came and went with hardly a word to say about Art or Artists. It was not till after his return from Italy in 1787 that the genius and distinguished personality of Raeburn had furnished a nucleus for a small coterie of professional artists, of which he himself, the elder Nasmyth, David Allan and the eccentric Skirving would form the inner circle. One or two minor portraitists like Martin and Willison, with a few others who combined engraving or the teaching of drawing with the practice of some branch of Art would complete a group which, till the close of the century, can hardly have numbered more than twelve or fifteen. But all through the succeeding generation the number of native painters had shown a rapid increase, and, as has been seen, artists of capacity like Nicholson, Joseph, Ewbank and Grecian Williams had been attracted from south of the border. This had naturally led to the formation of the Associated Artists and Edinburgh Exhibition Societies; and the success of the former, whilst it was wisely conducted, had shown that there was in Edinburgh a field for the Fine Arts as well as for Science and Literature. Since 1816, the year which saw the last of those Exhibitions, the growth of the professionals had gone on at an increasing ratio, both as regards numbers and ability; and it was their failure to realize this that had led the Institution to treat their associated artist members as a negligible quantity, and so to court the swift disaster which overtook them.

The estimation in which the Fine Arts were now held in Scotland is reflected in the literature of the period; the writings of Scott, Wilson and Lockhart alike bearing witness to the growing interest in Art which characterized the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Travellers, real or fictitious, no longer ignore the artist. Bewick, who, on his Scottish tour of 1776, records only a call made on a brother engraver, on revisiting the city nearly half a century later speaks with enthusiasm of the exhibition of paintings by Raeburn held in the great gallery of his house in York Place shortly after his death. The work of William Allan, historical painter, also claims his attention, and, amongst others, he pays his respects to his old friend Nasmyth and his townsman Nicholson. The delightful Welsh clergyman of *Peter's Letters*¹ is more voluble, and in his communications with his kinsmen of the Principality, he devotes many pages to the studios he had visited on his fictitious travels in the north. Art topics are discussed from time to time by Wilson and his boon companions of the Noctes, whilst the camaraderie of the Arts is further attested by the establishment of a Dilettanti Society which included in its membership the cream of the artistic and literary celebrities of the north, and the quite recent foundation of the Institution, with its scores of noblemen and gentlemen, shows that society proper had also succumbed to the aesthetic movement.

No doubt such an environment had much to do with the optimism of the Academy during its years of seeming weakness. For even when its fortunes were at the lowest ebb, the members had faced the situation in the hopeful spirit of a gathering strength which was bound to carry them through. They had had experiences, one would say, sufficient to depress the spirits of any body of average men. But there was never anything like dejection in their attitude. Take the send-off dinner to their ablest sculptor, Samuel Joseph, on the eve of his leaving for London in the spring of 1828 as a sample of the spirit in which the members met "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune." A full record has, fortunately, been preserved of this memorable feast. The banquet hall was the Academy's great room in Waterloo Place, and Nicholson presided in the absence of the President through indisposition. The guests seem to have been numerous. A well-known trio, Gleadhill, Templeton and Hartley discoursed music ; the speeches, if they lacked the more polished graces of oratory, were hearty and to the point ; but what would a present day company, which grows impatient over half a dozen toasts, have thought of an occasion where, besides some twenty-five to thirty items on the formal list, "many other toasts which we cannot particularize were given in the course of the evening" ? At which of the small, or not so small hours of the morning the proceedings terminated seems the only serious omission in the lengthy record.

The minutes and correspondence of those opening years also give evidence that some well-known features of Art Exhibitions are not so recent as one is apt to suppose ; for a very considerable part of the Secretary's work seems to have been connected with the forwarding of works which had been going the round in search of purchasers, just as they do now. In particular there are numerous letters of this sort to and from a Mr. Parker of the Academy of Arts, Newcastle-on-Tyne, the place from which pictures already shown in the farther south would naturally pass northward. Stranger still is an invitation card asking contributions for an Exhibition of works by living artists shortly to be opened in Dumfries, with the familiar formula that "all expenses of carriage, etc., will be defrayed by the Committee"—what is now called a Special Invitation. A similar exhibition had been held in a west country town some fifteen years earlier ; there may have been others, but somehow the thought of works of art destined for such provincial collections jolting along on country carriers' carts takes one rather aback in these days of swift and easy transmission. Nor can one omit to record an application made to the Academy by the Rev. Principal Baird for assistance on behalf of Education and Religious Instruction in the Highlands and Islands, and the Council's response "that an unlimited number of tickets of admission to the Exhibition should be given to the Rev. Principal for disposal at one shilling each, the proceeds to be added to the General Assembly's fund as the contribution of the members of the Scottish Academy." It is gratifying to know from a later entry that the Council's gift was thankfully accepted, and that it resulted in a considerable addition to the Committee's resources.

PART II

FROM THE RE-CONSTITUTION OF THE ACADEMY, 1829, TILL THE ERECTION OF THE NEW GALLERIES ON THE MOUND, 1850-55

THE Academy as reconstituted by the award of Hope and Cockburn included almost all the artists of ability practising in Scotland. Alexander Nasmyth was the only notable exception ; though one might perhaps add that less known painter, Fleming of Greenock,¹ whose abilities, as shown in some of his delineations of Highland scenery, might well have entitled him to a place within the body. They were mostly resident in the capital, and considering they were the product of so small a community, the number of men of talent amongst them was remarkable. Of some fifty names which appear on the roll of membership before 1840, one at least, David Scott, possessed genius of a high order. Of several others it may be said that, in their finer efforts, they stand within the magic circle ; whilst a clear majority of the painter members were capable craftsmen, endowed with that true instinct of the brush which is the bed rock of the art. The sculptors and architects also were men of mark in their own departments ; and to one of the latter, Thomas Hamilton, the Academy owed, and was still to owe, more, perhaps, than to any of its members.

Such a combination and variety of talent augured well for the future, but all was not to be plain sailing. For, though the influence exerted by Hope and Cockburn had led to the unanimous acceptance of their award by both parties, it soon became evident that, in the carrying out of some of its provisions, there was scope for the old rivalries. The continuation in office of "the intelligent, active and public-spirited gentlemen now holding these situations" had been strongly recommended, but at the General Meeting held for the election of office-bearers on 11th Nov., 1829, John Watson Gordon was proposed for the Treasurership and elected by a considerable majority over Hamilton. Again, on the Council named in the award to carry on the business for a certain stated period, the original Academy men were in a distinct majority, the aim of the arbitrators in this being to protect the weaker party. But that it was distasteful to the Royal Institution men is evident from the fact that the two representatives allowed them took little part in Council business. They were biding their time, and at the first opportunity, not only was Hamilton thrust out of office, but the Council was thwarted in another matter, which led to a vehement protest from the ex-Treasurer. Coming, as it did, just after the President had congratulated the newly constituted Academy on the happy solution of their difficulties, this action of the more powerful body, so directly at variance with the spirit of the award, must have struck a note of discord, though it cannot have been altogether unexpected. On the other hand, the Annual Report read at the close of the same meeting would gratify both sections of the membership with its record of increasing revenue and sales, and of the position the Academy was taking in public estimation, as evinced by the elections during the year of Dr. Chalmers as Chaplain, of Professor Wilson to the Professorship of Ancient Literature, and of other eminent citizens to the chairs of History, Antiquities and Anatomy.

The superseding of Hamilton in the Treasurership showed a spirit of hostility to the most energetic of the founders of the Academy. This can hardly be set down, as one recent historian of the body has suggested, to an unwillingness of the painter members to be controlled in any respect by an architect. A more likely explanation is that Hamilton, like many other excellent officials, was somewhat autocratic in his methods, for such courses, even when they make for the best interests of the institutions concerned, are prone to be resented. A better illustration of this could hardly be supplied than that revealed in the following episode.

In recording the purchase of the "Judith" and the commissions given by the Academy for its pendants, it was mentioned that there was a sequel to those transactions. During the correspondence attending on these earlier purchases, the relations between the Academy and Mr. Etty had become very close and friendly. On the completion of the "Judith" pictures, the Council intimate to the artist "their complete approval and warmest thanks for the manner in which he had completed the series." At the same time they resolved to exhibit the pictures along with the "Benaiah" and "The Combat," should they succeed in obtaining them, on which matter Mr. Hamilton was requested to communicate with the artist. Mr. Etty readily agreed to lend the "Benaiah" which, like most of his works, had returned from the Royal Academy unsold, and having obtained the consent of the owner, John Martin, to "The Combat" also being lent, a special Exhibition of Etty's pictures, along with the Diploma works of members, was opened on December 13th, 1831. The effect, we are told, was brilliant; and one can well believe that the five works of the great English colourist, then in their pristine beauty, seen together for the first time, must have surprised even his northern admirers. The sight of them was too much for the ardent ex-Treasurer, and before the Exhibition was opened, Hamilton tabled a proposal that the "Benaiah" and "The Combat" should be added to the Academy's collection, having taken care to ascertain beforehand the terms on which this could be done. The fact that three meetings of Council were held to discuss the subject indicates that there was some difficulty. But nothing could withstand Hamilton's ardour, and on the third meeting, the opposition members absenting themselves, it was unanimously agreed to purchase the pictures on the terms offered. On the day following, the ex-Treasurer writes to Etty: "I am truly happy in being the medium of transmitting the following communication from the Council of the Scottish Academy. At a meeting of the Council held yesterday it was resolved to purchase 'Benaiah' and 'The Combat' at the terms mentioned in your letter of 28th ult^{mo}, viz. 'Benaiah' 130 guineas with frame, and 'The Combat' £300 with interest since the date of Mr. Martin's purchase of it from you." A few days later Etty replies, in one of his delightful letters, ratifying the purchase on his own behalf and on that of his friend Martin; gratified exceedingly that those works of his prime were now united permanently in one great focus. He compliments the Scottish Academy on having set "such an example that other and richer societies may rub their eyes and awaken from the lethargy and stupor that have so long possessed them." But the incident, as the politicians say, was not yet closed. The malcontents were only waiting their opportunity, and at the next General Meeting, held on February 10th, the large attendance, as meetings then went, showed that some matter of importance was on the tapis. David Scott in his journal has this characteristic and vivid note of the occasion:

"February 10th. Meeting of the Academy about the purchase of Etty's pictures. Allan, our respected chairman, sits with one hand over the other, as if he were thinking of his lost finger. Hamilton, whom I like as a man to carry a thing out, half rising, explains the transaction; he has bulk enough to give him weight. Harvey sits still with his sharp though small eye, observant enough; and Macleay, with good mustaches and proper boots, stretches his legs straight out, one foot over the other, and his cane at his mouth. Ewbank swings on his chair; and Steel leans his head on his hand. There is also J. F., as they call Williams, with his paralytic, important shake of the head; and Hill's broad sensible face. Curious are the bodily characterisations and limitations of intellect."

At this meeting, after some statutory and other business had been got through, Mr. J. F. Williams, hardly a man of weight, though a universal favourite, rose and politely asked those members of Council who had sanctioned the transaction for some information respecting the purchase of the two pictures. Hamilton, Harvey and Macleay, the members appealed to, declined to give any information on the subject, Hamilton maintaining that it was within the power of the Council to make such purchases, and that if information was wanted the time to ask for it was at the Annual General Meeting in November. The members generally expressed themselves as extremely disappointed that the general body had not been consulted. Ultimately Mr. Williams stated that the action of the Council infringed one of the laws of the Academy, to which Hamilton replied that the said law was not imperative. After the Secretary had read the minutes of the Council Meetings, at which the purchase had been proposed and carried through, it was resolved, on the motion of Mr. Allan, "That whilst the meeting are unanimous in their admiration of the pictures of Mr. Etty recently purchased by the Council . . . they yet consider that a purchase of such importance should not have been made without the approval of the General Meeting, and that by doing so the Council have exceeded their powers." This resolution was carried by a large majority. Here was the making of a pretty quarrel, threatening a dead-lock in the working of the Academy. A suggested means of settlement having fallen through, the impasse became so serious that the matter was submitted to Messrs. Skene and Jamieson for their opinion. What might have been the sequel to these legal preliminaries no one can tell; for, happily, as in the case of the recent union, the difficulty was solved in a better way.

During the preceding autumn, Etty had paid a visit to Edinburgh. He records, in letters to various friends, his enthusiastic reception by the members of the Academy, and his delight in seeing the triptych, which had cost him so much thought and research, occupying three sides of the octagon in which it was placed. It had occurred to him, he tells us, that if only his other two large pictures, "Benaiah" and "The Combat," were placed beside them, it would be such a collection of his works as might well gladden a painter's heart; and when Hamilton's letter, intimating that the Council had decided to purchase them, reached him, his delight knew no bounds. "Thus then," he writes, "one of the first wishes of my life is accomplished, and all my large pictures are fixed permanently in Edinburgh, in one grand focus. For which I desire to be thankful to God, with all humility."

News of the unhappy result of the transaction which had so gratified him was not long in reaching the painter; and though it was the undoing of one of the dreams of his life, he wrote immediately, offering on behalf of Mr. Martin and himself, to take back the pictures, hoping that this might be the means of "restoring peace, harmony and good feeling amongst my friends of the Scottish Academy." The fine spirit pervading the letter, which was of considerable length, proved the solvent of the difficulties into which the Academy had fallen, and on its being read at an ensuing meeting, certain resolutions were proposed and carried, of which the last and most important was: "This meeting therefore unanimously resolve to make good the purchase of the pictures, and at the same time remit to the Council to carry into effect their resolutions, and instruct the Secretary to intimate the same to Mr. Etty and Mr. Martin by return of post." Whatever the law might have decided as to the powers of the Council would have left a soreness with one party or the other, and though Hamilton's methods were somewhat high-handed, it was well for the future of the Academy that, when the purchase was suggested, there was at the helm "a man to carry the thing out." Thus, again, were the artists of Scotland saved by a wise compromise, and the young Academy were free to face a future which presented difficulties enough without the paralysing addition of internal dissension. The course of events since the union had furnished a much-needed commentary on the closing paragraphs of the Report submitted at the first Annual Meeting of the re-constituted body, in which the President and Council urge the necessity for "unanimity and cordiality . . . by merging all secondary considerations in a regard to the great objects of their association." At that time everything boded success; union, which means strength, had been attained, and the finances were in a flourishing condition. The Academy were gaining rapidly in public estimation, and with the Royal Institution out of the way, so far as direct competition was concerned, they seemed to have the ball at their feet. Yet before it had well started on its new course, internal dissension had well-nigh wrecked its future prospects.

At this distance of time, and with our changed ideals, it is difficult to realize how much the Academy owed to the spirited policy of the Council in making those Etty purchases. Its effect in turning the tables on the Institution has been referred to; but the bold venture had brought the Academy more than a local reputation; it was hailed with enthusiastic applause in London. In his reply to Hamilton's intimation of the latest purchases, Etty writes—"Sir Martin (Shee), Wilkie, Martin, Collins, Hilton, etc., etc., . . . laud you to the skies. . . . Wilkie said to some of the members present that they ought, by sending to your next Exhibition, to prove the high sense they entertain of such a noble effort . . . and was very warm on the subject now and at our dinner in July." This goodwill and support of the President and members of the Royal Academy meant not a little to a body founded on their example, and who had followed them so closely in all the details of its constitution and procedure; and not less to the Art public of Scotland, the majority of whom then, as now, regarded the opinion of the metropolis on such matters as final. Since early in the century a considerable number of the more ambitious Scottish artists had chosen a London career. By this time several of them held a prominent position there, and their talent had been recognized north of the Tweed by election to Hon. Membership of the Royal Institution or of the Academy. Naturally, they were deeply interested in the efforts being made by their professional brethren in the north, and shortly after the union of the two bodies, a desire was expressed amongst them to assist in the formation of a Scottish School of Painting by contributing works which, along with the Diploma works of Academicians, would lay the foundation of such a school. And, though their language is somewhat vague, the hearty co-operation which has since then existed between Scottish artists in the north and in London has had its effect in evolving certain qualities, common to both, which entitle them to be regarded as a distinct school.

But there were troubles yet to face ere the Academy entered on that "long straight road" of prosperity which, somewhat later, marked a full half century of their existence. With effective opposition got rid of, with so many talented men on their list of membership, and with the support of a public recently awakened to Art interests, the trend of things during the next few years is difficult to account for. The Exhibition receipts and sales, which during the stress of rivalry with the Institution had been steadily rising, decreased as steadily during the four succeeding years. But no more than in their earlier years do the Academy's records show any flagging of spirit, and before long the Council are busy over various projects for completing the equipment and advancing the interests of their society. Some six months after they had lost Hamilton's official services, William Nicholson, who had so wisely guided them through many troubles, acting as a restraining power, one can guess, on the more impetuous Treasurer, asked to be relieved of the Secretaryship. He was succeeded by David Octavius Hill, a young man of enthusiastic and genial temperament, who, perhaps to the detriment of his success as an artist, served the Academy with a rare devotion during his forty years' tenure of office. As Watson Gordon resigned the Treasurership in 1832, giving place to Mr. J. F. Williams, the difficulties of the immediate future had to be faced with new and comparatively inexperienced men at the helm. Fortunately, all through those official changes, Hamilton's active participation gave continuity and energy to the deliberations of the governing body, of which he was still a member. These were mostly concerning the establishment of a life school, and of a Pension Fund, the provision of new galleries, and, as a matter of course, the obtaining of a Charter. The last named must have awakened unpleasant memories, amongst the original members at least, but in their new circumstances it was resolved to make another effort to attain the object of their ambition. And so, about this time, we find Mr. Elder submitting the draft of a petition to the King, William IV. for a Charter of Incorporation. In spite, however, of the Academy's having only a few months previously, on the occasion of his Accession, flattered His Majesty by a reference to his Royal Father's having, in his liberal patronage of the Royal Academy, given an impulse to art "unexampled since the days of Leo the Tenth," nothing came of their application.

Like their eighteenth century predecessors, the Edinburgh School of St. Luke and the Glasgow Foulis Academy, the later societies of Scottish artists never lost sight of the original purpose of such associations. As soon as they had the necessary funds the Associated Artists had set about the establishment of a Life Class. The fact that, before starting their own class, they had made an unsuccessful application to the Board for the use of a room in their School of Design, promising to use the male figure only, seems to indicate that the study of the nude was no part of the curriculum at the Trustees' Academy; and the next certain knowledge of facilities being provided for such study is from the Memoir of David Scott by his brother, Mr. W. B. Scott. There reference is made to an Edinburgh Life Academy which was held in a room in Infirmary Street from 1827 to 1832, "at which time," it is added, "the Royal Institution began their school for drawing from the living model." This, no doubt, refers to the introduction of Life study in the Trustees' Academy, which had been transferred to the Royal Institution building in 1826, and was now under the charge of William Allan.

But the existence of a school under the guidance of one of their own members did not seem to the Council to be a reason for evading what had always been regarded as one of the essentials of an Academy of Art. In Mr. Elder's letter to the Lord Advocate, of December 1826, concerning the application for a Charter, one of the objects the applicants have in view is "To open an Academy where the Fine Arts may be regularly cultivated, and at which the students in the Arts may find that instruction so long wanted and wished for in this country, free of expense." The matter had been allowed to lie dormant during the first strenuous years of the Academy's existence, but within a few months of their reconstitution, the Secretary is asked to prepare "an abstract of the Laws relating to the Life Academy in London for the consideration of next meeting," with a view, of course, to the establishment of similar schools. For some years the subject crops up at intervals, only to be ordered "to lay over," as Nicholson's English pen has it. The difficulty of providing suitable accommodation rather than any lack of zeal on the part of the Academicians was the hindrance. Latterly this establishment of schools got mixed up with the provision of new galleries; nor was it till the century had entered on its second half that, with the erection of the new building on the Mound, an arrangement was come to between the Academy and the Board by which Life teaching was assigned to the former and the Antique School to the latter. During that long interval, however, an Academy class had been carried on from 1836 to 1840 in very inadequate premises at the Institution, and later in more suitable rooms rented, first in Register Street, and afterwards at 33 Abercromby Place. The four years' location of the class in the building of its quondam rivals requires explanation.

The disappointing financial results of the years 1830-34 had determined the Academy to secure a more central position for their Exhibitions. Their lease of the Waterloo Place rooms expired in 1835, and, in anticipation of this, towards the close of the previous year the Council made application to the Directors for the use of the Royal Institution galleries for their annual Exhibitions, and for other two apartments for the housing of their pictures, library and other property, and to afford accommodation for a Life School and a School of Painting when these are instituted. The application signifies the Academy's willingness to pay a rent should suitable accommodation be granted. Their case was a strong one, based, as it was, on the fact that the Institution building had been erected from national funds, and mainly for Fine Art purposes. For such they had been used in the days of the Institution's prosperity, but since 1830 there had been little occasion for their occupation in that way. The Directors did not attempt to combat the Academy's claim, as the body which best represented the artists of Scotland; for after some haggling as to conditions of tenure, they granted the use of the galleries from February 1st to May 1st of each year, at a rental of £105.

For a good many years to come at least, the Academy had little reason to be dissatisfied with their new Exhibition rooms. The receipts from attendance, which had shown only a slight recovery in 1835, leapt up by more than £300 in 1836, whilst the increase in sales was even more marked; and from this date onwards the records tell an almost wearisome tale of advance in material prosperity. It was the inadequacy of the accommodation placed at their disposal for their classes and the housing of their Art property, together with a financial controversy presently to be referred to, which raised the troubles and misunderstandings that lead on to the solution of the fifties.

Since some years before the foundation of the Academy, the establishment of a Pension Fund had occupied the attention of the community of resident artists; and when the Directors of the Institution commenced their series of Exhibitions of modern pictures in 1821, it may be remembered, one of the conditions made by the artists was that the free proceeds were to be set aside as a fund for the benefit of their widows and families. When the artists associated with the Institution joined the Academy it became a question whether the Directors were bound to implement this bargain, but, whatever their legal rights, they at once recognized the moral obligation they had come under ; for shortly after the Union, Lord Meadowbank intimated the intention of the Directors to hand over the money to the Academy. Why they were so dilatory in carrying out this pious intention it is hard to tell, but at length, in the spring of 1835, the sum of £614 was paid over in name of the free proceeds of the nine Exhibitions with the interest which had accrued, and a donation of £100 from the funds of the Institution. Afterwards, when bad blood arose between the two bodies, the sum allowed as free proceeds—£430—was called in question as being much below what was due, but at the time it seems to have been accepted as satisfactory. At a General Meeting held early in the following year a resolution was moved and adopted that two-thirds of the gross annual income of the Academy be applied towards the promotion of a Pension Fund. This was made one of the provisions of the Charter granted two years later ; for, as if to crown the good fortune of the Academy, and to afford an additional instance of the truth of the adage "Nothing succeeds like success," in answer to a third memorial presented in 1837, Mr Elder, at the Annual General Meeting of 1838, had the satisfaction of laying on the table Her Majesty Queen Victoria's Royal Charter of Incorporation, dated August 13th, 1838. One cannot but regret that the President was not spared to see this fulfilment of the Academy's early ambitions. He died on August 24th, 1837, and William Allan had been elected his successor.

George Watson, though of only limited capacity as a painter, was a capable man of affairs, and since the earlier years of the century he had been recognized as a leading personality amongst those whose aim was the establishment of an Artists' Society carried on and controlled by artists ; and the success of the Exhibitions of the Associated Artists from 1808 to 1813 was, no doubt, largely due to his judicious management. The aims of the Institution do not seem to have attracted him, but when the scheme to found an Academy was set on foot, Watson was marked out as the man to preside over the body ; and though he had little of the enthusiasm of Hamilton or Nicholson, he justified his election to the Presidency by a most admirable conduct of its affairs in very trying times.

At this point, with the Academy fairly established and just entering on a long period of prosperity, one might ask whether the time and energy expended on what is, after all, only the scaffolding of Art, was being justified by the results. In other words, had the Scottish Academy been instrumental in the production of a truly virile Art amongst the people from whom its membership was drawn?

With the general question as to the influence of Academies on Art we have not here to do. But, so far as Scotland is concerned, it may safely be asserted that only through some such organization was a national Art possible. Without the rallying centre and the material conditions supplied by the Academy, and to some extent by the short-lived earlier societies, Scottish artists, like their eighteenth century forerunners, would have continued to drift southward, and all that virility which comes from a close and continuous touch with the country and its people would have been lost. The rôle of the smaller national, and even of the civic schools, is well known to all students of Art history; nor is it without a reflex influence on the more cosmopolitan centres, which are largely recruited from those smaller fields. So the place taken by Edinburgh in the Art world not only contributed an element previously lacking to Scottish culture, but was the means of strengthening British Art through the many able Scottish painters who ultimately settled in London.

Accordingly, one is not surprised to find that before many years are over some of the ablest members of the Academy have gone south. The young aristocrat, Frank Grant, is amongst the first, and whatever his dreams may have been, they can hardly have exceeded the career that was before him, which culminated in the President's chair at Burlington House. The versatile William Dyce, after having painted one or two child portraits not unworthy of Sir Joshua, followed a few years later, to waste the best years of his life in organizing National Schools of Design for a Government which constantly thwarted his suggestions, and ultimately to come under the spell of English Pre-raphaelitism, as he had commenced under the earlier movement led by Overbeck and Cornelius. Robert Lauder, too, with his young bride, a daughter of Thomson of Duddingston, sets out for Italy in some bitterness of spirit, and with little intention of again making his home in the city which he thinks has neglected him. "My native land—Good night!" is the Byronic farewell he flings to the country of his birth. But though he carries out his intention of settling in London on his return, neither there, nor whilst abroad, does he forget Scotland or the Scottish Academy. In Rome the spell of the Wizard of the North is on him as well as that of Titian and Michael Angelo; and during his three years there and those he spent in London, in numerous letters to the local Maecenas, Mr. D. R. Hay, of George Street, he gives instructions concerning the pictures he is sending north for exhibition, and, in such works as "The Glee Maiden," "Louise," and "The Trial of Effie Deans" he gives of his best. William Simson follows Lauder's example both as regards the Italian pilgrimage and settlement in London, where the painter of "Solway Moss" spent the last years of his too short professional life. Lawrence Macdonald, one of the two or three sculptor members, was already in Italy, and elected to remain there; exchanging some years later his membership for hon. membership of the Academy. David Scott, who spent a year and a half in Italy during the earlier thirties, gives in his diary some vivid glimpses of the Art community in Rome, and of the Scottish artists he met amongst the cosmopolitan throng. Charles Lees and Dyce he had seen in Paris, and the latter (from whom he has a commission to copy one of Michael Angelo's Sibyls) again in Venice. But in Rome, though Andrew Wilson and Robert Lauder were there, he consorts mostly with the sculptors Park and Macdonald, with whom and one or two others he "talks wildly of religion, Evil and Good." Unlike his brother painters, Scott did not aspire to a London career. After a few days there and a week on board the Leith smack, he reaches Edinburgh, where for some fifteen years longer he followed his lofty ideals, a solitary and dignified figure in the artistic and intellectual circles of his native city. Despite his melancholy temperament, he was assiduous in his attendance at Academy meetings, and took a full share of whatever business was on hand.

But, such absentees notwithstanding, there was quite a large Art community in Edinburgh, of which, as in the past, one has glimpses in various contemporary records, and these are all the more interesting when they come from strangers. A few years after Etty's visit came Dibdin, whose Northern Tour, published in 1838, gives at some length the impressions left on him by what he saw in the various studios and collections he visited in the Scottish capital. Dibdin's visit must have been made during 1836. Time had dealt leniently with the Academy. Though it had completed its first decade, death had claimed no victim from amongst the forty, whilst one only had been taken of the half-dozen who had been elected since the union of 1829. Things had begun to look up. The first Exhibition in the Institution galleries had just been held with eminently satisfactory results. The Royal Association for the Promotion of the Fine Arts in Scotland, recently instituted, was becoming more and more popular, and in the Exhibition just closed sales to a considerable amount had been effected through its agency.

So Dibdin found the brethren of the brush in good spirits. A chance meeting with the secretary, Hill, in Dumfriesshire, had furnished him with a passport to the studios of Edinburgh, and, being an amateur of the art himself, he gives a delightful record of the pleasant time he spent amongst his new-found friends. For though he sometimes expresses himself in terms which are not very clear, his comments are valuable as coming from a man of some culture in the arts, and well acquainted with the works of contemporary English painters. Like all travellers of that date, he is struck with the commanding and picturesque aspect of the city. Going westward to his hotel, "We passed," he says, "the Parthenon of Mr. Playfair, in other words, the Museum and Academy of Painting." Later, on paying it a visit, he is astonished by "the gigantic groups from the pencil of our Etty. . . . This first room," he goes on to say, "is a blaze of splendour which promises to revive all the lustre of that of Reubens;" and on visiting the gallery of casts upstairs, "I know not," he reflects, "how many embryo Raeburns, Wilkies and Allans may be at work there." He considers that Scottish artists generally execute their pictures in a low, grey, and sometimes even ochrey tone of colour, and in this stricture he includes Raeburn's portraits and those of John Graham (Graham Gilbert). Watson Gordon's please him better, as not being chargeable with "the besetting sin of ochre," and he praises specially that of Sir Walter Scott painted for Mr. Cadell. At the Secretary's "ample and joyous breakfast table" he meets many artists, amongst them George Harvey and W. B. Johnstone. On visiting Harvey's studio he finds him at work on "Shakespeare before Sir Thomas Lucy," and speaks of the splendid plate being prepared by Mr. Howison of the "Game of Curling." Dibdin, after something of a rhapsody concerning this work, winds up: "Talk to a Scot of golfing and curling, and he will say, 'the former is only Prestonpans ale, the latter is mountain dew.'" Devotees of the respective games may be left to settle the appositeness of the dictum, but Harvey's spirited rendering of "the roaring game" was sufficient to draw forth such an expression from one who would be equally ignorant of both. He pays a high tribute to a sunny landscape he had seen of Thomson's, who, he thinks, develops all the grandeur of Gaspar Poussin in the choice and grouping of his subjects, and he speaks with even higher praise of Andrew Wilson's "Vallombrosa"—"a great master performance—the sun of Both and the atmosphere of Lorraine." "It has been purchased," he tells us, "by a lottery," of the working of which he proceeds to give some details. This is, of course, the Association just referred to. Various other members of the Academy are mentioned, and at Mr. D. R. Hay's he sees several examples of Scott Lauder "of a surprising quality for colour;" his treatment of the sapphire colour in a subject from Peveril of the Peak draws forth his special admiration. "The sash of Peveril in that colour stands out like the floating cloak of Bacchus in Titian's unrivalled picture in our National Gallery." He mourns the death of Grecian Williams, whose "Marathon" he thinks might have inspired Lord Byron, and that of the deaf and dumb Geikie, which took place before the publication of his volume, to the illustration of which he and one or two other Scottish artists had contributed. Though at Mr. Hill's, print-seller, a brother of his friend the Secretary, he was shown a copy of Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, with engravings from "the truly original designs of Mr. Scott," he does not seem to have met the painter himself; but he paid more than one visit to the studio of William Allan, whose adventurous early career and later historical works made him the lion amongst Scottish artists of the period, and marked him out as George Watson's successor in the Presidential chair, to which he was called the year after Dibdin's visit. He saw something too of the social side of the artists' life, though he expresses regret that through the invitation card having failed to reach him, he missed being present at a meeting of "a very curious society they have here, that of St. Luke," on which occasion, he hears later, the members had been "very jollily disposed," and that more than one little monosyllabic hour had struck before the meeting broke up. Mr. Allan had been chairman. "Generally speaking," he adds, "an Englishman has but an imperfect knowledge of Scotch gaieté de cœur at these carousals."

During the twelve years comprised in the presidency of Sir William Allan, though the struggle for fuller recognition and better conditions continued throughout, the Academy's growth in prosperity and influence was maintained. The arrangement of 1835 with the Institution and the Board of Trustees had been followed by the best results in regard to their Exhibitions; and if the same could hardly be said of the facilities for teaching then conceded, the opposition which developed within a few years was vexatious rather than formidable to a body now dignified by the acquisition of a Royal Charter. And to a generation deeply imbued with the Byronic cult, it was no small matter that the Academy should have at the head of its affairs one whose professional reputation was so largely associated with regions made popular by the poet, and who, moreover, had found his material through a lengthened residence, first amongst the tribes of the Ukraine and Caucasus, and some years later in Turkey, Greece and Asia Minor. These circumstances and his genial personality,¹ rather than any special skill of craft, though that was by no means inconsiderable, gave Allan the position he held in the eyes of the literary and social world of Edinburgh. Nor was his reputation merely local; in 1826 he had been elected associate of the Royal Academy, and nine years later to its full membership, whilst some of his more notable works had found homes in leading English collections. And whatever we, with our changed standards, may think of the position assigned to him by his contemporaries, there cannot be a doubt that to have as its President one who had counted amongst his friends and patrons King William IV., the Czar of Russia, Wellington and Sir Walter Scott was a great gain to the Academy; nor need we be surprised that Allan's studio, with its works of historic or romantic interest in various stages of progress and its costly properties of Eastern costume and armour, left the strongest impression on such visitors to Edinburgh as were interested in Scottish Art. His appointment to the Limnership to Her Majesty for Scotland on the death of Wilkie in 1841, with the accompanying Knighthood, was an added dignity, not only to the recipient, but to the body over which he presided.

The inaugural years of the new President's term of office happily synchronized with a rapid growth in the national wealth, which, with other agencies at work, soon brought a larger field for the sale of works of Art. Amongst the contributory agencies none did more towards the spread of an enlightened taste than "The Association for the Promotion of the Fine Arts in Scotland," which has more than once been referred to.

This Association, the first of its kind in the United Kingdom, was inaugurated in 1834 by a body of non-professional gentlemen interested in the progress of Scottish Art. The chairman and several of the members of its first committee of management were members of the Royal Institution or of the Board of Trustees. Yet its declared purpose was the encouragement of sales at the Academy's Exhibitions, which shows how skin deep were the differences between professionals and patrons at this time. It has been pointed out that during the years following the reconstitution of 1829 the sales had sunk to a very low figure, considerably lower than was realized in the Exhibitions of the Institution ten years earlier; and, with the great increase in the number of exhibitors, the prospect was serious indeed. The situation was saved by the timely action of the committee, presided over by Lord Meadowbank, who represented the Association. Taking as their model certain Continental societies, and in particular one recently formed at Prague under Imperial patronage, they adopted the principle of the Committee's selecting the works to be allotted by ballot, in the belief that by so doing a certain coherence and continuity could be given to the patronage exercised. In theory they were undoubtedly right, for, given a capable and conscientious committee, the object of the Association—"the promotion of the Fine Arts"—is much more likely to be attained so than by the giving of money prizes and the taste of the individual purchaser. And though the democratic tendencies of the age have led to the almost universal abandonment of the principle they adopted, it was well both for the Scottish School and for the growth of taste throughout Scotland that, during those formative years, the selection of the prizes was, generally speaking, in such capable hands. Their first purchases were made in the Exhibition of 1835, when, out of £728 received in subscriptions, £630 were expended on the acquisition of twenty-seven pictures. In the following year £868 were expended on thirty-five pictures, whilst a sum of £250 was retained towards the engraving of David Scott's picture "The Crucifixion" for distribution amongst those subscribers who had not been fortunate enough to secure a prize. The subscriptions this year had amounted to £1270. That such a large proportion of the income could be devoted to the main purpose of the Association shows how well and economically it was managed. For the next half-dozen years its progress reads like a fairy tale, and in the earlier forties its income, drawn not from Scotland only, but from many cities and towns of the United Kingdom and even from our colonies, was sometimes nearer seven than six thousand pounds. In one of those years no less a sum than £4765 was spent on the purchase of a hundred and thirty-eight pictures and two pieces of sculpture at the Academy's Exhibition, besides £1200 on the engraving for the year. Nor were these sums the only boon the Association brought to the artists of Scotland, for, as its founders had rightly predicted, their competition acted as a stimulus to private purchasers, and the amount expended from that source had greatly increased.

These beginnings of material prosperity were accompanied by a more amicable spirit between the different Art bodies, and though complaints continue to be made by the Council regarding the inadequacy of the accommodation provided for their schools and exhibitions, they are more or less of a formal nature; and even when, in 1840, the Academy, having failed in repeated efforts to secure a suitable apartment at the Royal Institution, resolved to hire premises in Register Street, the situation was accepted without ill-feeling.

From this date the study of the living model, which, owing to the difficulties just referred to, had been intermittent only, was carried on under more favourable conditions, and during the succeeding fifteen years many of the more notable academicians took a prominent part in the teaching. John Syme, Thomas Duncan, David Scott and John Steel, had been appointed visitors in 1836. Houston, Eckford Lauder, Harvey and others, share in the work later. The appointments being annual, the names disappear and reappear at longer or shorter intervals. One—that of David Scott—is permanently associated with the class, and disappears only with the failure of health which preceded his death. Duncan's premature decease in 1845 was a great loss to the school, which in the following year was removed to 33 Abercromby Place, where premises were hired "greatly superior to those previously in use," though the report is careful to add "altogether inadequate for the full educational scheme of the Academy." In connexion with the teaching reference is more than once made to the copying of Etty's pictures, both by members and students.

In the meantime the Exhibitions were succeeding beyond all expectation. In 1843 the galleries were opened on certain evenings in the week, and though at first the attendance was not satisfactory, two years later the Annual Report announces the complete success of the experiment, the rooms being crowded to inconvenience. Very soon the partial opening is made general, and for a long series of years the evening attendance added largely to the Academy's resources.

As a result of this continuous financial success the Pension Fund soon reached the amount at which, in accordance with the Charter, annual pensions might be granted. This provision was first acted on in 1845, another of the long cherished objects of the profession being thus achieved.

Progress was also being made with the formation of a Library. In the charter of 1838 this is specifically stated as one of the aims of the Academy, and during the two previous years presentations of books and engravings had been intimated in the respective reports. The very limited accommodation at the disposal of the Academy, and its uncertain tenure, militated against this side of their development ; but these drawbacks notwithstanding, the collection had so increased, by presentation and purchase, that when, some twenty years later, a room was set apart for it in the new building, it included a large and valuable collection of volumes bearing more or less directly on the history, literature, or philosophy of the Fine Arts.

The harmonious relationships of the Academy with the Board and the Directors were unfortunately interrupted in 1844 by an incident, trivial in itself, but which re-opened in an aggravated form misunderstandings which were in a fair way of being arranged or forgotten. In the course of a heated and undignified controversy which followed, statements and personal allegations were made by the Secretary to the Royal Institution, which threatened, a year or two later, to have their sequel in the Law Courts. This was happily averted through the good offices of Lord Cockburn, and an apology tendered to the Council of the Academy ended this phase of the quarrel. But, early in 1845, the Secretary to the Board, who had been personally concerned in the incident referred to, had managed to bring about a situation which, if persisted in, would automatically have deprived the Academy of the use of the Institution galleries for their Exhibitions.

Some ten years previously a collection of pictures, valued, Dibdin says, at £14,000, had been bequeathed to the city of Edinburgh by Sir James Erskine of Torrie. The Lord Provost and the Sheriff of Midlothian had been appointed trustees of the collection, which had hitherto been housed in the University Library hall. By an arrangement now concluded with the Board, the Torrie pictures were to occupy, permanently, two of the rooms hitherto granted annually, at a stipulated rent, for the Academy's Exhibition; and when its bearing on the latter was pointed out by Mr. Hill, the curtly official reply was that, as the arrangement had been sanctioned by the Treasury, the Board regretted that it was beyond their power to renew the grant of the two rooms to the Academy in future.

Into the elaborate communications which passed between the Academy and the Board as to the arrangement made in 1835 it is unnecessary to enter. It is sufficient to say that though a subsequent resolution of the Board "that the use of the galleries be granted for the following year at least, and that a Committee be appointed to consider the whole matter," strengthened their conviction that the general body of the Trustees were well disposed towards them, the Council were too well aware of the persistency of the governing official clique to have much confidence in the security of their future tenure. This was borne out by an intimation received early in 1846 to the effect that the use of the rooms would be given for the Exhibition of 1847, but no longer.

This exasperating dog-in-the-manger policy on the part of the Trustees and Directors had produced a strong public feeling in favour of the Academy—for the citizens were keenly interested in the maintenance of the Exhibitions—and during the autumn of 1845 a series of articles appeared in the Edinburgh Evening Post, in which the case for the Academy was set forth with great ability. In the following year these, with an appendix of very valuable documents bearing on the subject, were published under the title Scottish Art and National Encouragement. More than once reference has been made to the Academy's indebtedness to members of the legal profession; but it is doubtful whether a more opportune service was ever rendered them than by the author of those letters, Alexander Monro, Sheriff of Linlithgowshire.

The correspondence with the Board concerning this critical situation had led the Academy again to submit their grievances to the Treasury in a Memorial dated August 1846, and, considering their past experience, it must have been no small surprise to the Council to learn that it had been most sympathetically received. And when in December 1847, Mr. John Shaw Lefevre, one of the secretaries to the Board of Trade, to whom had been committed the duty of inquiring into the whole matter, gave in his Report, the Council may very well have congratulated themselves on the result of their exertions, and on the prospect of quieter times.

The Report presented to the Treasury by Mr. Lefevre was the outcome of a tactful and judicious handling of a very complicated situation, and the proposals contained therein were exceedingly gratifying to the Academy.

Ever since the erection of the Royal Institution building the matter of congestion had been a growing difficulty. What seemed ample accommodation in 1819 was very soon found to be no more than enough for the various claims made on it. The building, it must be remembered, was only partly intended or adapted for Fine Art purposes. From its foundation a large portion of it was devoted to the housing of the Royal Society, and, as time went on, other and sometimes incongruous uses were found for premises occupying so convenient and central a position. It is little wonder then that the limited space available for the Exhibition of works of art, and for art training, was soon found inadequate. The increase in the number and ability of resident artists, which produced the reconstituted Academy, would of itself have demonstrated this; but with rival bodies each having their ideals of annual and permanent collections, the situation had become unworkable.

In successive Memorials addressed to the Treasury the Academy had urged that assistance might be given towards the erection of a building for their Exhibitions and schools, but hitherto a deaf ear had been turned to their appeals. Mr. Lefevre's Report endorsed this claim; its leading feature being the erection of a building for the accommodation of the Academy, towards which that body had signified its intention of contributing such a sum as might be found necessary, up to £12,000. Subsequently, however, it was intimated that, as another part of the Report recommended the bringing together of the works of Art belonging to various public and Art bodies in the city to form the nucleus of a national collection, the Government had resolved to erect an additional building as a Scottish National Gallery. To this patriotic resolution the Academy had readily assented by placing their very valuable Art property at the disposal of the Government, and by waiving their claims to ownership, or part ownership of the works purchased by the Royal Institution, as long as they were devoted to a like use.

Designs for the two buildings were prepared by Hamilton and Playfair, but on being submitted to the authorities in London, both were rejected as being too costly of realization. The twin building ultimately adopted was proposed and designed by Playfair. Of the designs for the separate structures, those by Hamilton—who, since the death of Mr. J. F. Williams in 1846, had been re-elected to his old position as Treasurer—were much preferred by the Academy; and all who know the beautiful elevation drawings of the buildings standing side by side, with the roadway passing between, are agreed that an opportunity was then lost of a decorative treatment of the Mound which is not likely to recur. Financially the Academy fared better than in the first proposal, for “in order that they might be free to devote more of their funds to the furtherance of Art,” they were informed in May 1849, that a larger amount than that previously contemplated was to be obtained from the funds administered by the Board of Manufactures, and that the Government were willing to undertake the rest of the expense of the building.

The site for the new twin building was granted by the Town Council for the nominal price of £1000, it having been previously valued by three different experts at about forty times that sum, and one of the conditions on which such favourable terms were offered was the provision of a home for the Royal Scottish Academy. It is needless, in view of more recent events, to discuss the complications which arose between this date and the passing of the Bill, the opposition which had nearly thwarted that consummation, or the misgivings on the part of the Academy that they had been somehow outwitted in the form in which the Bill was drawn; are not these things chronicled in Sir George Harvey's “Notes”? Under the guidance of influential friends and well-wishers the various pitfalls were avoided, and the Bill became law on August 13th, 1850; the combative Treasurer alone protesting against the inadequate provisions of the Act.

It is a curious coincidence that as his predecessor, George Watson, had died shortly before the grant of the Royal Charter, Sir William Allan had passed away a few months before this next landmark in the Academy's history. He died on February 22nd of this year, and early in March John Watson Gordon was elected President. Shortly thereafter the honour of Knighthood was conferred on him by Her Majesty Queen Victoria.

The years of Allan's Presidentship were notable for the number of important figure pictures shown at the annual Exhibitions, and of these a large proportion belonged to what were designated “the higher branches.” Stimulated by the example of their President, of Wm. Etty and of Sir David Wilkie—who had now turned from the genre by which he is best known to historical subjects—some half dozen of the leading Academicians devoted themselves to that class of work. In this they were encouraged by the Association (one of whose aims was the fostering of those “higher branches”), which spent large sums for works dealing with Allegory, History or Romance. It is not easy to arrange works of Art in artificial categories, but this has been attempted in several of the early Reports of the Association, where the works in the contemporary Exhibitions, so tabulated, are set over against their expenditure in the respective branches. This invariably shows how large a proportion went to the acquisition of important figure subjects, and of landscape in the grand style, of which Thomson of Duddingston, Andrew Wilson and young M'Culloch were the leading exponents. The figure painters mainly patronized after Allan, who—it goes without saying—comes in for the lion's share, were Scott, Duncan, Fraser, Scott Lauder and Harvey. The versatile Wm. Simson shares those favours in a lesser degree, and Dyce's name appears once or twice before he was called to London on Government service. The art-loving public of Edinburgh could thus count on a number of subject pictures of commanding interest, not from extraneous sources, but from the studios of members of the Scottish Academy, and it is doubtful whether during those years the Royal Academy itself could show more attractive works than those exhibited year after year by the artists named above in the Institution Galleries. Certainly such pictures as Scott's “Traitors' Gate,” Duncan's scenes from the Jacobite era, Lauder's “Trial of Effie Deans,” and Harvey's “Covenanters' Communion” and “Leaving the Manse,” had much to do with the extraordinary and increasing popularity of the Exhibitions.

In dealing with the Academy's first decade it was noted that its ranks remained almost unbroken. This continued for a year or two longer; but with the advent of the 'forties the veterans begin to fall. The year 1840 saw the removal of Alexander Nasmyth and the Rev. John Thomson. In the year following a still more distinguished name, that of Sir David Wilkie, disappears also from the honorary list. He died at the comparatively early age of fifty-six. The Academy's minutes record letters of condolence to the great artist's relatives, and that a sum of 100 guineas was voted towards a proposed memorial in London. Shortly afterwards they were able to secure at the painter's sale his unfinished picture, “John Knox administering the Sacrament at Calder House,” now in the National Gallery of Scotland. It was not till 1844 that, with the death of Wm. Nicholson, their first Secretary, the ranks of the active Academicianship were again broken. A heavier loss soon followed, for in 1845 Thomas Duncan was taken at the age of thirty-seven. Before the close of Allan's Presidency the ranks had been further depleted by the death of the Treasurer, J. F. Williams, and, sorest loss of all, David Scott, still young in years though wasted by pulmonary disease and disappointed ambitions. But the Academy's position was already secure, and with a host of able youths competing for membership, they could face the future with confidence, undismayed by the inevitable losses time brings, nay, made stronger in every way by the memories of such men as Duncan and Scott and Allan.

When one tries to recall the conditions under which Scottish Art and the Academy so developed and prospered, some superficial conclusions have to be revised. Scotland is apt to be regarded as a country given over to rather prosaic interests and bitter ecclesiastical controversy, and it has been considered a self-evident proposition that such is an eminently unfavourable soil for the growth of the Fine Arts. But what are the facts? During a period when ecclesiastical questions seemed to absorb the whole faculties of the nation—for these were the years of "the Ten Years' Conflict" and the Disruption—Scotland had room for other movements, and amongst them the Art movement, which the hasty thinker is prone to set down as an unlikely accompaniment. There was really nothing strange in this; rather the opposite, for wherever the spirit of a people is deeply moved, the latent faculties are sure to be stimulated in diverse directions. And so we have the intense religious earnestness of the period, and the enthusiastic pursuit of the Fine Arts, not only co-existing, but in a manner co-operating and indebted to each other. Dr. Chalmers was chaplain to the Academy, whilst the movement he led was stimulated by Harvey's pictures of some of its contemporary incidents, and of those of the Covenanting times which it recalled; for these were very popular, and engravings from them may still be seen over the length and breadth of Scotland.

Hints of the social side of the Academy's corporate life are not wanting in their records; mention being made from time to time of Evening Promenades held in the galleries, by means of which substantial sums were raised for charitable or national purposes—one in April 1844, was in aid of the fund for completing the Scott monument. There are the usual loyal and dutiful addresses incumbent on chartered bodies, notably that presented to Her Majesty and the Prince

Consort on their first visit to Scotland in 1842, which was made the occasion of conferring the honour of Knighthood on the President. Two years later the social event of the Art world was the banquet given to their old friend Wm. Etty, on the occasion of his coming to Edinburgh in the autumn of 1844. The visit was a surprise one, hurriedly undertaken by the artist to see—and to show to a brother from Java—his five great pictures in their new abode at the Institution. But though thus taken unawares, a demonstration was improvized in the form of a dinner at Barry's Hotel on the artist's second and last day in the city, when "notwithstanding the shortness of the notice, and though it was the dull season in Edinburgh, some thirty members of the Academy assembled to receive him." The interval of thirteen years had only increased the enthusiasm of the Scottish artists towards the painter of "Judith" and "The Combat." "At the threshold of the feast," to quote Gilchrist's life of the painter, "a further unexpected compliment awaited Etty. The folding doors being thrown open—which separated ante-room from dining-hall—a large and magnificent one brilliantly lighted, the painter's eyes were saluted, to his strange delight, by his chef-d'œuvre 'The Combat' at the upper end of the room and of a table sumptuous with plate." There were the usual after-dinner speeches and interchange of compliments before the company separated. "The artist returned," writes his biographer, "well-pleased with his successful trip." His northern friends were to see him no more—at least on their side of the Border—but for yet a full generation the memory and tradition of those visits of the great colourist lingered in Edinburgh studios; and if, for the moment, the name of William Etty no longer holds the market, and is even flouted by some superior critics, that is a fate which has frequently overtaken the greatest of artists. As with those other masters, with Etty it can be temporary only, for amidst the welter of new isms and theories the adage holds good that the first qualification of the painter is to paint; and where, amongst the moderns, is to be found his superior in that sense of colour and mastery of the brush which are the main constituents of the craft?¹ A few years after his death, which took place in 1849, the Academy purchased from

Etty's executors his copy of Titian's "Venus of the Tribune," a work which reveals even more than do his original compositions his kinship with the great Venetians. Without over-labouring the point, it may be said that the lines on which Scottish Art developed during the middle decades of the nineteenth century owed not a little to the Academy's twenty years' associations with William Etty.

Political conditions had, during the period already dealt with, been, on the whole, favourable to the cultivation of the Fine Arts, and the century entered on its second half in the general expectation of a prolonged peace.

PART III

FROM THE ACADEMY'S OCCUPATION OF THEIR NEW GALLERIES, 1855, TILL THEIR ENTRY ON THE RE-CONSTRUCTED ROYAL INSTITUTION BUILDING, 1911

I

THERE is a saying to the effect that the happiness and prosperity of a country are in proportion to the brevity of its annals. If the same may be predicated of institutions, the Academy's most prosperous time was the thirty years following their entry on the new galleries in 1855, for, compared with the contentious earlier decades, its record is tame and flat.

There were great doings at the inauguration, and the Exhibition, a specially good one, was the most successful on record. In their, comparatively speaking, commodious new home, the Academy enter on a more dignified corporate life. A gold medal, designed by Mr. Noël Paton, as a badge of office for the President, was executed by Mr. Wyon of London; and from 1857 silver and bronze replicas of the same were given to Academicians and Associates with their respective diplomas. The collection of Art property proceeds apace, and even when the larger part of it had, by the terms of the Treasury minute, been housed in the newly formed National Gallery, there remained for the embellishment of the Academy's private apartments many valuable and interesting works, including portraits of most of those who had been prominently associated with the founding of the body, and with the earlier art movements in the Scottish capital. Also, by the appointment of Mr. James Drummond as Librarian in November 1857, the collection of art volumes which had been accumulating for twenty-five years was at length made fully available for the use of members and students.

Though the Academy had entirely approved of the proposals of the Treasury minute in regard to the allocation of the teaching, the opening of the Life School did not take place for a year or two. Visitors were appointed and a scheme drawn up for the conduct of the school in 1859, but owing to the necessity of extensive alterations on the room assigned for the purpose, it was not till towards the close of the following year that the class got under way; a long-standing source of altercation between the Academy and the Board being thus finally removed. It is indeed gratifying to note all through these transactions the changed attitude of the former combatants. The Council have only to hint at some desired improvement to have it admitted and promptly carried out; whilst at all Academy functions the officials of the Board are honoured guests. After more than twenty years wrangling, like the rival pipers at the wedding of the immortal "Shon Maclean," they

"Embraced like brothers and kindred spirits,
And fully admitted each other's merits."

Till some years after the middle of the century Scottish Art, though to some extent recognised south of the Border, was practically unknown on the Continent; but in 1855, on the occasion of the first International Exhibition in Paris, several portraits by Scottish painters attracted great attention, and gold medals of the first class were awarded to Sir John Watson Gordon and to Francis Grant; and of the second class to Macnee and one or two other painters, as well as to the Architect Treasurer Hamilton. It may have been as much owing to the impression made on French artists and art critics by the works so honoured, as to the political alliance of the two countries that when, a year or two later, a request was made by the Council that French Art should be represented at their annual Exhibition, a response was received intimating that, by special command of the Emperor, four pictures from the Luxembourg Museum were being forwarded to Edinburgh. These were Christ giving the Keys of Paradise to St. Peter, by Jean Dominique Ingres; The Defence of Paris in 1814, by Horace Vernet; Jewish Wedding in Morocco, by Eugène Delacroix; and The Princes in the Tower, by Paul Delaroche. The works thus kindly lent were by men of European reputation, and they formed the chief attraction in the Exhibition of 1857. On their being returned an address was forwarded to His Imperial Majesty, in which the Council regard the favour as a pleasing token of international amity, and revert to the close relationship of Scotland with France in earlier times.

In the summer and autumn of this year an Art Treasures Exhibition was held in Manchester, a city which had for some time been distinguished for its patronage of the Fine Arts. The Exhibition, the forerunner of many others, constituted an era in the history of British Art, and revealed both to our own people and to foreigners, not only the extraordinary wealth of Old Masters which had found their way into our insular collections, but also the virility of the native school from Hogarth onwards. To the modern section of the Exhibition the Academy lent their five great Ettys; and to the galleries at Old Trafford the artists and art-loving public of Scotland, as well as of England, flocked in great numbers.

On the 4th of March, 1858, a letter was received containing the Revised Treasury Minute, by which the relations of the Academy with the Board of Trustees were regulated for many years. The minute was perused by the Council with profound interest and satisfaction, and in that spirit the letter was answered two days later. Hamilton, still as keenly interested in this crisis as in those of former years, had died only ten days earlier, and Mr. W. B. Johnstone had succeeded him in the treasurership. Shortly afterwards Mr. Johnstone was also appointed Curator of the National Gallery, to which, by the provisions of the minute, such of the Academy's works of art as were considered suitable were now transferred.

The most notable event of the next few years was the part taken by the Academy in the Volunteer movement of 1859-60. The expectation of a prolonged peace cherished about the middle of the century, and of which the great Exhibition of 1851 was regarded as a symbol, had been rudely falsified by the breaking out of the Crimean War in 1854, followed towards the close of the decade by the Italian War of Liberation. The swift successes of the French and Piedmontese armies over Austria had led to a recrudescence of militarism across the Channel; and to the consequent cooling down of the international amity referred to in a preceding paragraph. Napoleon III., like the first of the name, was looked on as arbiter of the European situation; and it needed only the aggressive utterances towards Britain of some of his more fiery supporters to bring back the age-long attitude of suspicion between the two countries. In response to these thinly veiled threats a wave of enthusiasm swept over the United Kingdom, and, within a few months, the Volunteer movement was a fait accompli; some two hundred thousand men being thus added to the defensive forces of the realm. From Land's End to John o' Groat's companies and battalions sprang into being; and nowhere was the movement taken up with more spirit than in Scotland and its ancient capital. The force consisted mainly of riflemen, but all branches of the service were represented. A feature of this spontaneous arming in the larger cities, was that in many cases companies were recruited from some professional or commercial body, and were named accordingly. Thus, in Edinburgh, the various legal bodies had their companies in the city battalions, as had also bankers, merchants, and civil servants, whilst, as in Oxford and Cambridge, learning was represented in a University company.

A paragraph in the Report for 1860 shows that the local artists had promptly responded to the appeal of the Lord Provost by forming themselves into a corps of Volunteer Artillery, that they had elected three Academicians as their officers, and that they had been officially recognised by the Academy, who subscribed £30 toward the working expenses of the company—now No. 1 of the City Artillery. The younger members were mostly in the ranks, whilst a number of the older Academicians, headed by the President, who subscribed £20, enrolled themselves as honorary members, each subscribing £5. From a circular issued in February, 1861, one gathers that the company then numbered sixty-four, over a score of whom were then, or later, members of the Academy. Mr. Noël Paton was Captain, and Mr. John Faed and Mr. James Archer, Lieutenants. William Fettes Douglas had initiated the movement; W. Q. Orchardson and Hugh Cameron being prominently associated with him in the formation of the company.

Some idea of the enthusiasm with which volunteering was carried on in the profession during the autumn of 1859 may be gathered from certain passages in Mr. Martin Hardie's John Pettie, R.A. At first the young painter, whose ardent temperament was, from the commencement, writ large on all his doings, fought shy of the movement, fearful lest it should interfere with his beloved studies. But once enlisted through the persuasion of Cameron and Orchardson, he took up the cause with his accustomed verve, and in various letters to his fellow-student M'Taggart, then at Campbeltown, we find him acting as recruiting sergeant for the company. Thus on August 28th :

Will you join? You must. Such splendid prospects we have of being stuck behind a stone dyke and peppering at an enemy. They talk of Government fortifying Inchkeith for us.

And again on November 1st :

My uniform will be ready on Tuesday. A little private drill will put you equal with us in no time. Your name is read out from the roll every night by Lieutenant Faed, and you are jotted down as "absent," my boy.

The same delightful memoir tells how, on a somewhat daring request of Pettie's, the two friends—now full-fledged gunners—were permitted by the officer in charge of the Royal Artillery to assist in the firing of the Royal Salute in the half-moon battery at the Castle, on the occasion of the Queen reviewing the Scottish Volunteers in August, 1860.

In the spring of 1862 the late Sir John Pender, a Scottish merchant resident in Manchester, well known as an Art collector, presented the corps with a six-pounder Whitworth gun. It is still to be seen at the headquarters of the Royal Garrison Artillery, Macdonald Road, but considering its history it might well adorn the Members' corridor at the Academy.

The distinctive professional character of the various companies of the Volunteer force did not long continue. It had never been recognised by the War Office, and, indeed, it was more akin to the spirit of those guild companies of Archers and Arquebusiers immortalised by Hals and Van der Helst, than to modern military organisation. One or two such companies of the City Rifle Brigade soon ceased to exist; and though the artist element in the premier company of the artillery survived well into the seventies, in course of time that too vanished. During the last quarter of the century artist volunteers were mostly associated with the City Rifles or with the local Yeomanry. Several of the latter served through the Boer War of 1899-1902. Now, artists rarely attain to academic honours till they are well over military age, but that the old spirit still exists is attested by the fact that in the more serious crisis in which we are yet involved over 270 of the teaching staff and students at the Edinburgh Art College have joined the colours.¹ Of these the machine-gun team attached to certain companies of the 5th Royal Scots, which, as being composed mostly of students aiming at a professional career, may be considered the lineal descendants of the Artists' Artillery of 1859, have won a quite exceptional reputation in the Gallipoli peninsula.

As has been noted, the thirty years succeeding the Academy's removal to their new galleries was a period of increasing prosperity, so far as prosperity can be gauged by material success. Though for the greater part of that time the annual Exhibition has its rivals, first in Glasgow, and afterwards in other Scottish centres also, the attendance and sales at those of the Academy were only stimulated by the rivalry. The Association spends considerably less than in former years, but it still adds materially to the sum total of the purchases, and it has more than fulfilled the expectations of its founders in the creation of a public ready to expend a fair amount on the encouragement of Art, and especially of native art. The big collection, got together at high figures from ostentatious motives—and not infrequently with an eye to a further rise in values—was as yet little in evidence north of the Tweed; but the taste for picture collecting was very genuine and widely diffused amongst our professional and business classes.

The provisions of the Treasury minute in regard to teaching worked smoothly enough, though there was in some quarters a natural irritation that the Trustees' Academy, which had come to be regarded as a national institution, should be dominated by the ideals of the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. That there was some sympathy with this feeling in the Academy is evident from the fact that in 1875, in response to a memorial addressed to the Board by the President and Council, the gallery of casts was opened to artists and art students, as nearly as possible on the same terms as before the year 1858. In the Academy's department there had been a steady increase in the number of students, and some years earlier additional facilities for Life Study—which had been meagre enough—were provided by the opening of a morning class. In course of time the class hours were considerably extended, whilst by the middle eighties—when the class attained its maximum numbers—several prizes and bursaries were, by the generosity of friends, available for the encouragement of the various departments of the artist's craft.

In virtue of the Academy's recognised position in the city the President and Council more than once petition against proposed alterations in connexion with schemes for City improvements, without much success it must be said; and one may be sure that the moving spirit in such appeals would be their Librarian, James Drummond, whose volume of Old Edinburgh sketches, executed between 1848-67, records for us what their petitions could not save. The more assured financial position enabled them also to subscribe towards several public or national purposes, and to commemorate suitably one or two Scottish artists of the previous century. Thus in 1866 a monument to the brothers Runciman was placed on the west wall of the Canongate churchyard, and eight years later a memorial to David Allan was erected over his grave in the Old Calton burying ground.

On its social side, needless to say, the Academy's life kept pace with its easier circumstances. The opening banquet seems, since about the later fifties, to have become an annual event, whilst the Receptions are increasingly brilliant. Since the opening of the National Gallery, the two sets of rooms were available for such functions, and one reads of 4,000 invitations having been issued for that of 1860. From time to time notable artists from the south are hospitably entertained, Stanfield and Roberts in 1858, Tom Faed in 1874, and on more than one occasion when the city was the rendezvous of certain associations, special Exhibitions were organised in connection with their meetings. The important place the annual Exhibitions held in the social year is aptly depicted by Alexander Smith in the preliminary chapter of A Summer in Skye :

"In spring time when the east winds blow . . . and when coughs and colds do most abound, the Royal Scottish Academy opens her many pictured walls. From February to May this is the most fashionable lounge in Edinburgh. The rooms are warm, so thickly carpeted that no footfall is heard, and there are seats in abundance. It is quite wonderful how many young ladies and gentlemen get suddenly interested in art. The Exhibition is a charming place for flirtation ; and when Romeo is short in the matter of small talk—as Romeo sometimes will be—there is always a picture at hand to suggest a topic. Romeo may say a world of pretty things while he turns up the number of a picture in Juliet's catalogue—for without a catalogue Juliet never appears in the rooms. Before the season closes she has her catalogue by heart, and could repeat it to you from beginning to end more glibly than she could her Catechism. . . . If many marriages are not made here, there are gay deceivers in the world."

Written about 1865, these lines might apply to the Exhibitions of many years before and after that date.

As regards the course and development of Scottish art during this period it may be said that, while keeping its individual flavour, the native school of painting was influenced by the various movements which had their origin in England and latterly on the Continent. From its rise towards the close of the eighteenth century, the Scottish School had owed much to the quality of its portraiture. In this department the virile art of Raeburn was continued through the Watsons, Graham Gilbert, and Macnee to George Reid and the later portraitists. At the date of the Academy's removal to its new home, the three first named were at the zenith of their powers, and they were supported in the annual Exhibitions by various able figure and landscape painters, the continuators of the tradition of Wilkie, Allan and Thomson of Duddingston. A younger school, influenced by the technique of Etty and Duncan, and touched by the more realistic tendencies of the time, had arisen towards the middle of the century. Noël Paton, the Faeds, Drummond, Archer, Nicol and the future President, Fettes Douglas, were its leading exponents. With painters of such varied tendencies as Bough, Fraser, Wintour and Robert Herdman as a link, these were followed in a few years by a group of talented men known as the pupils of Scott Lauder. For, notwithstanding the Byronic adieu to his native land and city referred to in a previous chapter, Lauder has been since 1852 Master at the Trustees' Academy, surrounded by a group of lads who, under the spell of his unique personality, were to sustain Scottish painting at a high level till the close of the century. And though the majority of them found their way to London within a few years, the more distinguished of these were soon associated with the Academy through Hon. Membership, and their work was as familiar in its annual Exhibitions as at Burlington House. In addition, they so strengthened Scottish art in the metropolis that an important section of the exhibitors at the Royal Academy were known as "the London Scottish," a title borrowed from the famous Volunteer regiment then recently embodied. But the name, and the common characteristics of their art with that practised north of the Tweed, had not a little to do with the recognition in the south of a Scottish School, and thus, after a full generation, the dream of the few north-country artists who had sent words of encouragement from London to the founders of the Academy became a reality. It is questionable, indeed, whether Scottish painting ever better deserved the title than during this period. Alexander Smith, who has already been quoted in regard to the social aspect of the Exhibitions, may help in this direction also.

"To others than young ladies and gentlemen the rooms are interesting, for Scottish art is at this moment more powerful than Scottish literature.

SIR GEORGE HARVEY.

FOURTH PRESIDENT, 1764-1770.

From the Portrait by Robert Hoodman, R.S.A., in the possession of the Royal Scottish Academy.

Perhaps some half-dozen pictures in each Academy's Exhibition are the most notable intellectual products that Scotland can present for the year. The Scottish brush is stronger than the Scottish pen."

And he proceeds to illustrate his thesis by references to certain works which, it must be confessed, have not all stood the test of time. But amongst the exhibits during those years there were a sufficient number of outstanding merit to justify the writer's remarks, and to sustain the interest of the exhibitions in the eyes both of artists and of the public. Watson Gordon held the place occupied by Raeburn at the beginning of the century, and his reputation was more widely recognised. This is sufficiently indicated by the fact that when, in 1855, the Birmingham friends and admirers of David Cox, the famous English water-colourist, resolved to present him with his portrait, the choice fell on Watson Gordon; although it involved a long journey to Mr. Cox, then in indifferent health. The account of this visit in Solly's Life of Cox may be quoted as giving a graphic note of the Scottish painter, then nearing three score and ten. The party—Cox was accompanied by his son and a Mr. Hall of Birmingham—arrived in Edinburgh on the evening of the 14th August, and on the 20th Mr. David Cox, jun., in a letter to his daughters, gives the following notes:

"15th August. My father has been for a first sitting, and I think it all goes on well. I expect he will not be wanted above five times. . . . Sir W. Gordon is affable and entertaining, with a grave and dignified carriage. . . . Monday, 20th August, Sir John has finished the portrait. My father is delighted with it. It is as real as can be and a very pleasing portrait."

Mr. Hall, who went with Cox and his son to Sir John's studio on the occasion of the first sitting, thus describes the meeting of the painters:

"They (the party) were ushered into a parlour, and the artist came out promptly from his painting room, and accosting Cox with a broad Scotch accent, said, 'Welcome to Scotland, Mistair Cox (sic)—but surely Maister, Mr. Hall.' . . . Sir Watson was delighted with his subject."

And later, when Cox saw the picture on its arrival at Birmingham, he writes to his son: "The portrait is the finest ever seen, and Mr. Birch thinks it worth one of his Turners."

Watson Gordon's successor, Sir George Harvey, had done more to give a national direction to Scottish painting, so far as subject was concerned, than any of his contemporaries. Since, as a youth of twenty, he signed Nicholson's circular, he had been, through good and evil report, one of the staunchest supporters of the Academy, and the Presidency conferred on him by his brother artists in 1864 was a well-deserved honour. During his long association with the body, he had dealt with history—past and contemporary—genre and landscape, and in all three his themes had in the main been national. In the two former, like most Scottish figure painters of his time, he was inspired by Wilkie; and in technical processes he was only too apt a pupil, with the result that few of those works of his prime, which so attracted his countrymen, survived the century in which they were produced.¹ During the twelve years he presided over the Academy he devoted himself mostly to landscapes. These were executed in a sounder technique; and, it may be added, those years coincided with the disappearance of the bituminous craze which had been for half a century attended with such disastrous results to the works of the majority of Scottish painters. The change came in a large measure from that search after the true colours of nature which characterised the English Pre-raphaelites and the rising school of Scottish painters some years later, and, if it unfavourably affected chiaroscuro and design, it gave a liveliness and gaiety to the Exhibitions of the period which was at once appreciated by the public.

Another influence, this time from abroad, came with Harvey's presidency. Alexander Mollinger, a young Dutch landscapist, sent from Utrecht two pictures to the Exhibition of 1865. They differed markedly from the work of native landscape painters and were the subject of considerable discussion in art circles. Lacking the qualities of the realism then in vogue, and painted in a low key, they had nevertheless a breadth and cohesion which was very attractive. Both works remained in Scotland, as did most of those the painter continued to send till his death a few years later. Influenced possibly by the success of their countryman, Mathew Maris¹ and Roëlofs contribute in the following year, and as indicating the widespread taste for collecting during that period, it may be mentioned that one of the first to recognise those harbingers of a new and potent influence was an East-Lothian farmer, well known to the writer, who had brought together on the fringe of the Lammermoors quite a notable collection of pictures, amongst which were the finer of the two Mollingers exhibited in 1865 and a smaller work by Roëlofs. It was thus, by way of Holland, that the movement founded on a systematic recognition of values, which had commenced in Paris, about the middle of the century, first reached this country. Towards the end of the century, with the increasing rush of art-students to Paris, the movement in its successive phases, changed completely the character of modern painting; but the time was not yet. The new influence was first noticeable in the work of George Reid, a young Aberdonian who had spent the summer of 1866 with Mollinger at Utrecht, and it was commented on, not over favourably, by his brother artists and the local art critics. He had a few followers; but, for twenty years longer, the vigorous blend of naturalism and tradition adopted by the Lauderites and their immediate predecessors continued to dominate the Academy's Exhibitions. The phase of the mid-century movement led by Walker, North and Pinwell in England influenced some of the younger men, but the Neo-Preraphaelitism of Burne-Jones and his school found little response.

Wilkie's example had not a little to do with this failing of so many Scottish painters of the period.

Nowhere was the painter's craft cultivated with more ardour than in the Edinburgh studios of those days, and one can accept as something more than an empty compliment Alexander Smith's dictum concerning the place held by some half-dozen works at each Academy's Exhibition in the intellectual production of Scotland. One or two passages in Hardie's John Pettie, and in a series of G. P. Chalmers's letters to a Dundee correspondent show the enthusiasm with which the rising men of the day pursued their art; and the latter will incidentally throw light on the Exhibitions of the middle sixties. Thus, of the beginning of his student days, Mr. Hardie tells us:

"Pettie always remembered his first walk with a fellow-student along Princes Street, the sudden clutch at his elbow and the reverential whisper 'There's Orchardson.'"

¹ One of Maris's two contributions appears in the Catalogue as the property of John Cairns. Cairns, who was a painter mainly of marine subjects, had paid a visit to Holland during the previous summer.

Orchardson was his senior by only a few years, but was already an exhibitor, and regarded amongst his fellows as a leader of the coming school. And what can be more delightful than this concerning his early intimacy with Chalmers?

“Pettie would stay talking till he had to remain for the night. So they would retire to bed still talking till they fell asleep” and “their talk was all of colour.”

This must have been about the time referred to on a following page, when, stung by one of his teachers having remarked to a friend that “though a fine draughtsman, he had no special faculty for colour, Pettie turned to the study of that quality.” “‘If other men,’ he said, ‘become colourists by working ten hours a day, I’ll work twenty.’” And of the indomitable energy and vigour he threw into all his work, a brother-artist tells how “he could not even walk from school to studio—he was always on the trot.”

Chalmers’s letters of dates 1864-8 reveal the ardent, impulsive nature of the man, his genuine unselfishness, and his alternate hopes and despairs over his work, in a way which vividly recalls him to surviving friends. In November, 1864, when they commence, he is already embarked on a smaller version of The Legend, a work which was to last him his life through; and which, shortly after his tragic death, was purchased, still unfinished, for the National Collection at the Mound by the Royal Association. This earlier picture he was painting for his correspondent, Mr. G. B. Simpson. At the date of the first letters, his troubles over it have already begun:

“Very kind of my splendid friend Mac (M’Taggart) to speak so well of my picture. I am not so sanguine as yet—it may turn out well—but as yet it may be sang or sermon for all I know. I have been working very hard in the middle of it just now—hoping and despairing alternately—had a fit of the blues about it—never mind, I am determined to work.”

Some six months later he writes (from his native town, Montrose),

“I came down here on Friday night and intend to stay till Wednesday probably. I shall then return to Edinburgh and try to sit down calmly to The Legend.”

But the succeeding letter shows him in deeper misery over it than ever.

“I have been labouring at The Legend very, very hard, and found that the composition was so bad that it positively would not come—in fact, it would not finish—I have therefore scraped the half of it out. God knows if ever I will be able to make a picture of it now . . . I am awfully miserable, don't know what to do. I feel quite ill to-day, and am not able to paint."

This fight over the magnum opus, on the carrying through of which he had set his heart, and with other pictures of lesser note on which he is successively engaged, crops up in accents of hope or despondency all through the correspondence.

A brighter note is struck in the many references to the works of his brother artists, which he regards mostly as triumphs. Though their successes, and the appearance they are able to make annually at the Mound, or at Trafalgar Square, accent to him his own failures and limited output, there is no trace of jealousy in his references to them. Thus on 21st January, 1865, after bewailing his difficulties with The Legend, he writes concerning the approaching Exhibition :

"M'Taggart is making a splendid picture . . . the most important, completed and best painting he has ever done, to my mind," and at the close of the same : "All the fellows are going in for large canvases this year. I will be very small. . . . About my picture of The Legend I am painting it quite small . . . for really, after all, what is size? Quality is the thing! Oh! I wish I could make it good."

Pictures by J. B. Macdonald, Keely Halswelle, Hugh Cameron, MacWhirter, Peter Graham, and others are spoken of in eulogistic terms, and he adds :

"Above all, and which will make an Exhibition in itself, we are getting Phillip's great picture La Gloria—Spanish Wake, truly a great picture—superb. I have not heard what the Academicians are to have, but from what I can gather, it will be a first rate Exhibition."

All through these letters there are similar references. His friends, Pettie and Orchardson, are already in London, but from time to time their successes, their visits north, and the prospect of their early election to the membership of the Royal Academy are noted, as in May, 1865 :

"I believe the Royal Academy is very fine this year. My friends Pettie and Orchardson are very fine, Millais, Hook, of course Phillip etc. all very strong. I heard from good authority, however, yesterday that Millais had expressed himself by saying that the palm was carried off this year by Scotsmen; isn't that splendid testimony?" and a few weeks later: "Had a visit from Pettie and Orchardson, who are carrying everything before them in London; immensely clever fellows they must be, both talked of, I believe, as the most probable associates of the R.A.; this is indeed wonderful success."

One is sorely tempted to quote largely from these interesting letters, but it is only as they bear on the relations of the artists mentioned with the Academy and its Exhibitions that they are relevant here. His forecast of that of 1866 is not so enthusiastic:

"I hear that there will be a scarcity of pictures from the 'young chaps' this year. M'Donald, I am told, will have nothing important. Cameron will be the same, also M'Taggart. I'll have nothing. MacWhirter will be strong."

An expression made use of in one of the quotations given above, "what is size? quality is the thing," will indicate to the profession what Chalmers and his fellow artists were striving after. In the language of the studio "quality" signifies that variety of surface by which painters, through certain artifices of the brush, are able to render the appearance of different surfaces in a way that is pleasant and satisfying to the eye. It is what the Devonian Gandy meant when he said to young Reynolds that a picture should have a richness in its texture, as if the colours had been composed of cream or cream cheese. It is what G. F. Watts refers to when he says:

"The recognition of quality of surface has been almost lost sight of by the modern eye and mind... It is the want of quality in Romney that places him so immeasurably lower than Reynolds."¹

It is, in a word, that which distinguishes the true painter from the designer, who merely tints his arrangements of line and chiaroscuro. This quality of surface and a remarkable deftness in the use of the brush were, indeed, the distinguishing characteristics of a large proportion of the works then contributed to the Scottish Academy's Exhibitions. Design and composition, from the decorative point of view, were not much in evidence, but the leading northern painters of the third quarter of the century were masters of their craft.

The later years of Harvey's Presidency were marked by no eventful changes. Most of those associated with him during the Academy's early struggles had predeceased him, many of the most prominent of them during his occupancy of the chair. More than all he would feel the removal of Mr. Elder, W.S., Law-agent of the Academy since its founding, and of Mr. D. O. Hill, who had held the position of Secretary for forty years, in 1869 and 1870 respectively. Mr. Hill had demitted office in 1869, and was succeeded by Wm. Fettes Douglas. He also, having resigned within a few months, John Dick Peddie, Architect, was elected his successor. When Sir George died on 22nd January, 1876, the Jubilee year of the Academy, he was the last surviving of the foundation members who had adhered to it throughout. His successor, Sir Daniel Macnee, though of the same age, had become a member under the Hope and Cockburn award.

Sir George Harvey's successor, Daniel Macnee, was the last of the Presidents who had taken part in the re-constitution of 1829. Not much history was made during his six years' tenure of the chair, but his taking up his residence in the capital strengthened the Academy, both on its artistic and its social side. He had, since quite a young man, been a citizen of Glasgow, and had shared with Graham Gilbert the leading position as portrait painter there, reigning supreme after the death of the latter in 1866. As already told, his work had been recognised by the award of a gold medal at the Paris International of 1855, where his masterpiece, Dr. Wardlaw, also gained for him the high honour of being named by Théophile Gautier, one of the two leading portrait painters of the English School.¹

Some years previous to this date it had been intimated to the Council that Mr. Henry G. Watson and Miss Watson, brother and sister of Sir John Watson Gordon, had made arrangements for founding and liberally endowing a Chair of Fine Arts in the University of Edinburgh, to be called the "Watson Gordon Professorship of Fine Art." The Chair, which thus associated the Academy with the University, and placed the latter in line with Oxford, Cambridge and London, where the Slade professorships had been founded some years earlier, was instituted during Sir Daniel's term of office. Its association with the Academy is more than nominal, as the President for the time being is conjoined with the University Court in the nomination of the occupant of the Chair, and as, by its constitution, a certain number of the Academy's students are entitled to free attendance at the lectures. Mr. Geo. Baldwin Brown was elected Professor in 1880, and during his thirty-six years' tenure of the position, his name has been prominently associated with all movements for the advancement of Scottish Art; for the preservation of the amenities of the city and its neighbourhood; and of buildings of historic or antiquarian interest throughout Scotland. Professor Brown has also served the Fine Arts in a wider sense through his interesting and valuable contributions to Art literature. In recognition of these services he was, in 1911, elected the Academy's Hon. Professor of Ancient History. In connection with the Academy's School, the Chalmers-Jervise Bequest, the Chalmers Bursary, and the Maclaine-Watters medal were instituted about this time, whilst Mr. John Leng of Dundee, for three successive years placed a sum of money at the disposal of the Council to enable a student of promise in each year to continue his studies by visiting Continental Art centres.

Shortly after the Franco-German war of 1870-71, French and Dutch pictures began to find their way across the narrow seas, not in isolated examples sent by the painters, as did those of Mollinger and Maris in the previous decade; but through the regular channel of art dealers. Pictures by the men of the Barbizon school and their Dutch contemporaries were soon to be found in the more choice Scottish collections, but it was some considerable time before they were much in evidence in the Exhibitions, or began to influence native art to any extent. One or two fine examples of Israels, lent by Aberdeen collectors, had appeared at the Scottish Academy in the earlier seventies, and in 1878 a superb composition by Corot "Souvenir d'Italie"¹ was borrowed from Mr. J. F. White of that city. Controversy raged around it, and though it shattered some of the canons to which they had hitherto conformed, the abler of the rising men recognised in it a work of rare genius. The summary methods of the grand simplificateur, as he has been called, were not a little perplexing to many whose life-long practice had been based on very different ideals, as indeed they had been in his own country till the painter was verging on old age; but, as always happens, the tide once turned, the flow of the new aims and methods ran full and fast. In the course of a very few years works much more difficult of comprehension than those of Corot were applauded by all who wished to be considered in the first flight. As a matter of course, the connoisseur who had mastered a few art phrases was not to be outdone by the professional. It is told of one such that meeting Sir Daniel in some exhibition of very select works, he called his attention to one in particular over which he proceeded to fall into ecstasies. "Such quality! such tone! such chiaroscuro!" "Yes, yes, so I observe," was the comment, "but what is it, flowers, or fruit, or fish? What does it represent?" On which the connoisseur, whom such philistine aspects of works of art did not concern, is said to have replied after a long and careful scrutiny of the canvas, and with some hesitation—"Do you know, I think it is meant for The Nativity"? Those who remember Sir Daniel will recall the twinkle of the eye with which he would receive the information, for he was known over the length and breadth of Scotland for his keen sense of humour and powers as a raconteur.¹ His faculty in the latter direction deprived his "sitter's chair" of the terrors it has for many, and is doubtless accountable, in part at least, for the genial presentments he has given of the many who occupied it throughout a long and successful career.

During Sir Daniel's first year of office there was held in the Academy's galleries an exhibition which, though brought together under the auspices of the Board of Manufactures, has had too important a bearing on the reputation of Scottish art to allow of reference to it being omitted here. It consisted of about 330 of Raeburn's portraits, and it attracted a great deal of attention at the time.² Fifty-three years had passed since Sir Henry's death, and, strange to say, though Scottish artists had always estimated him at his true value, and though a powerful and sympathetic article on the man and his work, from the pen of Dr. John Brown, had appeared two years earlier as preface to a volume—Portraits by Sir Henry Raeburn—his work was little known or esteemed south of the border. Dibdin, it will be remembered, was not very appreciative when he visited Edinburgh in 1836, speaking of his portraits as "ochrey." Later critics had been even more severe, and when, some months before the Raeburns were shown in Edinburgh, the Royal Academy held their first winter "Exhibition of works by the Old Masters and by deceased Masters of the British School," Raeburn's name did not appear in the catalogue. One thing the respective exhibitions made clear, that whilst the tradition of Reynolds and Gainsborough was hardly traceable in contemporary English portraiture, that of Raeburn was active in the corresponding department in the north. The great Raeburn vogue was still in the future, but from the date of the collection organised by the Board, his reputation has been on the up grade. In October, 1880, when the Congress of the Social Science Association was being held in the city, a very successful exhibition of works by deceased and living Scottish artists was brought together by the Academy.

During Sir Daniel's short Presidency several of the diminishing band of those associated with the beginnings of the Academy disappear from the membership, and when he died in January, 1882, only Mr. E. T. Crawford and Sir John Steell were left. The Academician list was also the poorer by the loss of several of its distinguished names of more recent date, notably those of George Paul Chalmers, who seemed just entering on a time of fuller accomplishment, and of Sam Bough.

In electing Sir Daniel Macnee's successor, the Academy kept up, though no doubt unconsciously, the alternation of the more general practitioner with the professional portrait painter. Fettes Douglas had long been known amongst his brother artists as a man of strong character, of wide culture, and of quite exceptional ability in a vein of art which reflected some of his absorbing interests, and which he treated in a manner entirely his own. In finesse of hand he has had few equals, and, the weird nature of many of his subjects notwithstanding, he was of a lively, sociable disposition and very popular in the profession. Manifestation of this was given by the attendance at the first banquet over which he presided—that of 1883—of nine members of the Scottish Academy Club¹ resident in London. It had been the custom on like occasions to exchange complimentary telegrams with a meeting of the Club held simultaneously in the metropolis, but, by the voluntary exiles, such were deemed quite inadequate to mark the election of "Willie Douglas"; it behoved them to come north in person. It goes without saying that great enthusiasm prevailed at this meeting around the festive board of almost the entire membership of the Academy—for the visitors were all members, either ordinary or honorary, and to some of the younger artists it formed an introduction to the non-resident section of the school.

In the April of the following year the Academy took part in the celebrations attending on the Tercentenary of the University, on which occasion the President received the degree of LL.D. On the afternoon of the 18th of that month Sir William and his Council received a large and distinguished company, including the Lord Rector and many of the Professors of the University, with the delegates from those of foreign countries and numerous representatives of learning and science, both native and foreign. The writer, as one of the two survivors of the receiving Council, has no doubt that, on that April afternoon, he bowed to or shook hands with more celebrities than he has seen during all the intervening years. The trouble was the difficulty in identifying them, for the official whose duty it was to announce the guests, after vainly struggling with one or two of the foreign names, took refuge in an incoherent sound which he meted out to all alike. After the reception hour was over it was possible to recognise some of the more illustrious strangers. The writer can remember Pasteur, gazing with all his eyes at the pipers of the Gordon Highlanders, who were stationed in one of the south octagons, whilst, at a respectful distance, a circle of spectators were reverently observing the great savant. Lesseps also, one can recall, and Robert Browning, the favourite of the students, by whom he was fêted, and to whom he made what is said to have been the one speech of his life, which they seemed to have no difficulty in understanding.

The attendance at the Exhibitions which, with slight fluctuations, had been rising for nearly half a century, attained its maximum in 1883. The same may be said of the number of works placed, which now averaged well over eleven hundred. Sales, though they had touched their highest point some years earlier, were well maintained; and that the commercial position was still such as to induce an increasing number to venture on a traditionally impecunious profession, is shown by the fact that the roll of students at the Academy's school had largely increased during the twenty-five years it had been carried on in the new building, and this although many aspirants for the new training were going direct to Paris. This increase in the number of practitioners, and the easy standard for admission, had transformed the already "many-pictured walls" of the sixties almost to a bewilderment of paint and gilding. From floor to cornice—and sometimes beyond it—there was no rest for the eye. When the small room variously known as "the condemned cell," "the coal hole," or "the Great Western Octagon,"¹ was still in use for the placing of works in oil, the arranging of them was usually left to the last elected Academician, who, in virtue of some unwritten law, had a place on the Committee of Arrangement. The narrow dimensions of the octagon, which for eight months of the year formed part of the National Gallery, were further restricted by the barbarous practice of boarding up the old masters to place the new, so that, when his task was over, the "prentice hand" found himself at the bottom of a well lined with pictures. The writer speaks from an experience of one of the most congested years.² In 1887 an effort was made to raise the standard by hanging fewer works above the line, but it was not till the nineties that a substantial reduction was achieved. The change then made may have been too sudden and drastic; but there can be no return to the former conditions.

Since the middle of last century several distinguished Scotsmen have been accorded centenary celebrations on a great scale; notably Burns and Scott, but neither north nor south of the border does our national temperament deem those who have excelled in the Fine Arts entitled to such recognition. Only in the Low Countries are the memories of great artists so honoured; but it is creditable to the Academy that they did not allow the centenary of Wilkie's birth to pass unrecognised. In a quiet way a number of the members and honorary members met on 18th November, 1885, at a banquet—the only way which seems to occur to the Briton—where the memory of the great genre painter was toasted in speeches from the President and others.

But change was impending. The long tale of increasing prosperity had run its course, and the later eighties witnessed a most serious falling off in the attendances at the Exhibitions, on which the Academy depended almost entirely for its means of support. All sorts of reasons were advanced for the

² When young men complain, as they still do, of their work being placed out of sight, I have sometimes to tell them of a brother artist, who sent to the Exhibition of 1869 a small figure subject. It got perched on the top of a large full-length portrait, or portrait group—and in those days the frames of such rested on a ledge at a considerable elevation—so that one could just make out on my friend's canvas one or two children squatted on the grass and gazing upward. It was catalogued The Skylark, with Shelley's well-known lines "Higher yet and higher" as quotation.—W. D. M.

SIR WILLIAM FETTES DOUGLAS.

SIXTH PRESIDENT, 1882-1891.

From the Portrait by Sir George Reid, P.R.S.A., in the possession of the Royal Scottish Academy.

sudden change—the great athletic movement which had begun some fifteen years earlier, and which was drawing ever-increasing crowds to witness field sports, the diminished number of historic and incident pictures exhibited, and the new, and to many, unintelligible trend of those taking their places. But no one of these explanations, nor all of them put together, seemed to account for the shrinkage which took place within a very few years. Other theories were not wanting. Every one with a grievance—and, with the multiplication of candidates for Academy honours, there were many—had his remedy. Within the membership there had for some time been a feeling that the number of Associates, as determined in the Charter, might be increased; also, in view of the considerable number of members non-resident, that something might be done to make the clause “resident and settled in Scotland” a condition of retaining as well as of becoming a candidate for the honour. Such remedies, of course, involved application for a new or supplementary Charter, and, as early as November, 1884, the Council, reporting on a remit respecting non-resident members, recommend to the General Meeting to consider whether it would be well to apply for a new Charter. The recommendation was unanimously approved, and the Council were instructed to make inquiry as to the steps to be adopted in the matter, the likelihood of their application being successful, and the probable cost. Owing, no doubt, to the serious fall in revenue of the years immediately following, the matter, which it was felt would involve a heavy outlay, was deferred till towards the close of 1888, when a large Committee was appointed to consider what alterations it was expedient to make, and to report.

It is unnecessary here to follow in detail the labours of the Committee or the complications which followed on the Academy's resolution to carry the matter through. Memorials from the Associates, from artists outside the membership, and in particular one submitting the views of Scottish Architects had to be considered. Discussion of these, and the preparation of a Memorial to the Privy Council concerning the petition lodged by the Architects and relative to the amount of the Academy's funds to be devoted to Art education, greatly lengthened the proceedings; so that it was not till the expiry of nearly three years that a letter from the Secretary for Scotland (the Marquess of Lothian) of date 4th November, 1891, announced in official terms the granting of the Supplementary Charter. The Royal Warrant was handed to the President, Mr. George Reid, who had only a month or two previously been elected to succeed Sir William Fettes Douglas, by Mr. John Smart, who had acted as Hon. Clerk to the Charter Committee; for once more, as in 1838 and 1850, a landmark in the Academy's history had closely followed the death of its President.

In August, 1890, intimation was received of a munificent bequest made by James Nasmyth, Hammersfield, Kent, in memory of his father, Alexander Nasmyth, often spoken of as "The Father of Scottish Landscape Painting," and who had been an Honorary Member of the Academy from 1832 till his death in 1840. The bequest, which the donor directs shall be named "The Alexander Nasmyth Fund," was for behoof of decayed Scottish Artists; and for this purpose it is administered by the Academy through its officials and a Committee elected for the purpose.

By the Supplementary Charter just granted several of the more obvious defects in the Academy's constitution were removed. The restriction on the number of Associates was annulled, and they were given a voice in the elections to both their own and Academician rank. They were also accorded a share in the government and administration of the body through the institution of General Assemblies of the Academy, both stated and special. And, for such members of either order as may leave Scotland for more than three consecutive years, there was instituted a non-resident membership, with provision for their being again placed on the active list, in the event of their return and settlement within ten years of the date of leaving. The provisions of the non-resident list applied only to those whose connexion with the Academy commenced after 31st October, 1891.

The eagerness of members to take advantage of their new powers was soon made evident, for no fewer than twelve associates were added at the election immediately following; whilst their recognition of the grievance of Architecture is shown in the fact that four of these were of that profession. This was but tardy justice, for there was no gainsaying the neglect with which the "Mother of the Arts" had for many years been treated.

To M. Talleyrand is attributed the saying, "Above all, not too much zeal," and in the estimation of Sir George Reid and other members of conservative instincts a further addition of ten to the Associate list in 1893 was proof that the majority of the members were getting out of hand. Indeed, so serious a view did the President take of the situation that he insisted on the new Charter's being amended so as to check such wholesale expansion. The amendment was applied for and granted in a few additional provisions bearing date May, 1895. Sir George Reid himself bore the expenses attending on these. Meanwhile, in deference to his views on the subject, no associates were elected in 1894 or 1895. The new provisions did not re-impose a limit on the order; but sought to attain their purpose by requiring confirmation by a second meeting of any decision the Academicians may have come to regarding the number to be added. As in the laws dealing with the subject a high quorum was named for both Assemblies, it was assured, at least, that the number agreed on was not the result of a snatch vote. And though recently it has been found expedient to reduce somewhat the quorums of those meetings, additions to the Associates' list have been kept within reasonable limits. Advantage was also taken of the opportunity afforded by this second Supplementary Charter to institute an Honorary Retired List for such members as, through advanced age, infirmity, or otherwise, were unable to fulfil the active duties of Academician or Associate.

It was well for the Academy that they had the courage to put their house in order when they did; for it is hardly too much to say that it was the means of saving them as a National institution. In the later twenties Scottish artists were, almost without exception, resident in Edinburgh. The capital was, indeed, the one art centre north of the Tweed, and there it behoved all practising artists to have their studios. Sixty years later the case was entirely different. Through the increase of wealth and the spread of taste there were now other fields for local art talent. The city of Glasgow in particular, which, from the days of Professor Hutcheson and the brothers Foulis, had never lost touch with the aesthetic side of culture, had within recent times acquired a European reputation through its rising school of painters, so that about 1890 the number of capable artists residing in, or in the neighbourhood of the capital of the west, might fairly challenge comparison with Edinburgh. Facilities of locomotion also were enabling the landscapist—an ever-increasing factor in the profession—to reside in some selected district without detriment to his commercial interests. Plus the inevitable leakage southwards, which since its founding the Academy had had to reckon with, it will at once be felt that a difficult position was brought about by these recent developments; for in place of the compact phalanx of earlier times, hardly more than half of the membership were available for its various duties and activities. This, in a body restricted in number, had the unfortunate, though quite natural, result of militating against the election of candidates other than residents in Edinburgh or its immediate neighbourhood. The Academy was thus in danger of becoming a civic rather than a national institution. This charge had been freely made against it, and there was some truth in the indictment.

The amended charters, with their provision of non-resident and honorary-retired classes, did all that could reasonably be done in the way of assuring a sufficient working body for the Academy's requirements, and, with the removal of the limit from the Associate order, made it possible to include in its membership the best talent of the country wherever it was to be found. This more truly national growth, and the reduction effected in the number of works placed in the Exhibitions were the leading features of Sir George Reid's presidency. On several occasions small memorial collections of the work of members recently deceased were included; as in 1891-2 of pictures by Sir William Fettes Douglas, and in 1897, 1900, and 1902 of works by Sir John Millais, Alexander Fraser, and Sir Noël Paton respectively.

In 1891, almost simultaneously with the granting of the first supplementary charter, there had been established in Edinburgh a new Art body, under the name of the Society of Scottish Artists. In its constitution it differed materially from the Academy, chiefly in its inclusion of a large number of lay members, and that the exhibition of works by deceased artists, British and foreign, was one of its declared purposes. But its formation was really due to the conditions which had arisen out of the greatly increased number of young professional artists on the one hand, and the cutting down of the number of works placed in the Academy's Exhibitions on the other. And though there was some feeling shown at the Board's having granted them accommodation in the same building, the Society had the sympathy of many and even the active support of not a few Academicians and Associates. It has undoubtedly done something to alleviate for many the conditions which the lean years following on a long period of prosperity brought with them. In the course of time its leading professionals were included in the membership of the older body, most of them continuing to contribute to the Exhibitions of both.

During the eleven years' tenure of the chair by an artist as accomplished, and certainly more versatile, than any previous occupant, the character of the Exhibitions continued to respond to the various influences now represented within the Academy. In portraiture the tradition of Raeburn was continued in the President's masterly presentments of character, and, modified by recent Continental influences, by one or two west country painters of great ability. Historic and incident pictures are less and less in evidence, whilst Landscape and combinations of figure with landscape, as expounded by the men of Barbizon and the later plein-air school of Lepage, take their places. Sir George Reid, it will be remembered, as a pupil of Mollinger, Yvon, and Israels before the rush to the Continent had well begun, was in full sympathy with those modern developments, and the landscapes he exhibited, alas! too rarely, though executed latterly in a much higher key, reflected his early training to the end. During his predecessor's term of office a strong impulse had been given to the current tendencies through a very fine collection of pictures by the leaders of the modern French and Dutch schools shown at the International Exhibition of 1886, the first of its kind in Edinburgh. So that the art public of Scotland were by no means unprepared for the change which came about within a few years, when Scottish Corots and Scottish Millets were exhibiting landscapes or field labour subjects which, though purporting to be of home origin, showed a striking resemblance to the trans-channel country or to the bloused and saboted toilers of the Beauce. Contemporary with this development of foreign motives came the picture known as "decorative," a term, like some others used to distinguish art movements, of vague significance. Decorative in the sense of Rubens's Luxembourg series, or the Tiepolos in Venice and Madrid, the so-called picture of the nineties was certainly not. It had more affinity with the art of the far East, to which attention had been drawn by the brothers De Goncourt some twenty-five years earlier. Its modern exponents concerned themselves more with pattern than with aerial tones, and with spacing rather than with composition in its old sense. Its ideals were thus in some respects the antitheses of those of the plein-air school. Whether or not these can be successfully combined it is unnecessary to discuss here; suffice it to say, that such a variety of aims brought some confusion both of method and motive to Scottish painting of the period under consideration. Sometimes it seemed as if the native element were to be swamped altogether, through the abandonment of the tradition of a hundred years. But the hope was that, as in the historic cases of Belgium, Holland, and Spain with Italy, the national strain would reassert itself, strengthened by the addition of qualities in which it had hitherto been deficient. And some support is lent to this view by the success many of the younger Scottish painters have since had abroad; for where the orthodox Scotsman could see only the foreign influence, Continental artists and connoisseurs recognised a distinct and virile Scottish School.

In October, 1902, Sir George Reid, whose increasing practice in the south had of late years involved a residence of some months in London, resigned office, and at the Annual General Meeting held on 12th November following Mr. James Guthrie was elected to succeed him.

The new President took office at a time when important changes were pending.

The provision of a National Gallery for Scotland in the settlement resulting from Sir John Shaw Lefevre's Report of 1847 had broadened the art situation in the north, and the joint occupancy of the building then erected, by the National Collection and the Academy, had made future changes inevitable if either or both institutions were to have any scope for expansion. Such changes had been delayed only by the inadequate provision made in 1858 for the growth of the National Gallery. But recent events had rendered it imminent.

The works available for a Scottish National Collection as foreshadowed in Sir John Shaw Lefevre's Report were (1) the collection belonging to the Scottish Academy; (2) that acquired by the Royal Institution, and at the date of the Report claimed both by that body and by the Academy; (3) the Torrie collection, the property of the City of Edinburgh; and (4) a collection belonging to the Board of Manufactures. Besides these there were several works purchased by the Association for the Promotion of the Fine Arts in Scotland, and certain others loaned privately for exhibition in the Institution building.

A National Gallery had been established in London in 1824, and since 1838 the collection, which had been brought together by purchase and gifts, had occupied the eastern portion of the building facing Trafalgar Square, erected by Government for its accommodation conjointly with the Royal Academy. As the result of a great Exhibition held in Dublin in 1853—when the construction of the new building on the Mound was well on its way—a movement was started for the establishment of an Irish National Gallery, and, a site having been obtained, a building for its accommodation was erected on Leinster Lawn out of Parliamentary grants, aided to the amount of £5,000 by local funds. Though Scotland's local contribution had been much larger, so far as the erection of the buildings was concerned the subordinate partners were thus placed on fairly equal terms. But whereas the expenses incident to the upkeep of the Scottish building and collection had also to be borne by the Board—with the trifling exception of £100 annually received for the housing of the Torrie bequest—the corresponding costs in Dublin were met out of Imperial funds. Further, whilst some works in the Irish collection were presented, bequeathed, or bought out of an originally subscribed fund, the great majority were acquired by means of grants annually voted by Parliament. In Scotland, on the other hand, almost the entire collection came from the local sources mentioned above.

This had long been felt to be a grievance, for, as there was no annual fund available, it was only by gift, or when some patriotic donor was ready to bear the cost, that representative works could be added to the Scottish collection. When additions were made from funds thus placed at the disposal of the Board, Government had latterly given an equivalent, but hampered by the condition that it must be spent within the year. This was very different from the annual grant made to the Irish gallery, where the Director was left a free hand. On more than one occasion, in letters to the Editor, attention had been drawn to the unfair treatment of Scotland, and once at least when a conspicuous instance of it arose, the matter was brought under the notice of one of the members for the city of Edinburgh by an associate of the Academy. The occasion was the sale of the Hamilton Palace pictures in 1882, when supplementary grants were made to the London and Dublin Galleries wherewith to purchase from that most famous of Scottish collections, whilst, as usual, not a penny was voted to Scotland. Sympathy was expressed by the member appealed to, and some vague promise made that if it could be shown that the public of Scotland were at the back of the demand the matter would be taken up in Parliament. That was an impossible condition, for the constituencies do not agitate about such matters; and for a year or two little was heard of the subject. But in the spring of 1885 the Academy, in their capacity as owners of a very large proportion of the works constituting the National collection, and as representing the Art interests of Scotland generally, memorialized Government, pointing out in some detail the injustice with which the Gallery was treated, and asking for an Annual Grant similar to that voted to Ireland. Nothing came of it. As when, on one or two previous occasions during the consideration of the estimates for such purposes, the question had been raised by some Scottish member with a vague sense that injustice was being done, the very complicated Art situation in the north made it an easy matter for the Treasury, always—and rightly—interested in keeping down expenditure, to brush the question aside. And indeed the successive guardians of the public purse had a very plausible case. To England and Ireland grants were made at the instance of the Trustees for the National Galleries of the respective countries. In Scotland, unfortunately, the guardians were not so designated, and, Shakespeare notwithstanding, there is sometimes a great deal in a name. So while it seemed appropriate to make grants on the recommendation of the London and Dublin Trustees, it was altogether different when the request came from a Board of Manufactures. Even north of the Tweed comparatively few were acquainted with the origin of the title, and in the House of Commons (where they were sometimes referred to as “Manufacturers”) the very mention of it was sufficient to prevent the matter from being pursued further.

From the Memorial of 1885 till the close of the century, save for an occasional revival of newspaper correspondence, the National Gallery question was allowed to rest. In the interval the claim of Scotland had been greatly strengthened by the establishment, mostly at the expense of an anonymous donor, of a National Portrait Gallery. The donor contributed £60,000 towards a building which the Gallery was to share with the Museum of the Society of Antiquaries; in addition the Board's funds were drawn upon to the extent of £10,500; whilst towards the acquisition of the site in Queen Street and for endowment, fittings, etc., something over £15,000 was given by Government. At the opening of the Gallery in 1889 the donor of the £60,000 was announced to be Mr. J. R. Findlay, a well-known citizen, to whom the National Gallery also has more than once been indebted. But so far from stimulating either the Board or the Academy to again urge the claims of Scotland, the comparatively trifling contribution of the Treasury to the Portrait Gallery seems to have been considered as a reason for abstaining from doing so. Both bodies, indeed, had given up the case as hopeless.

It was not till the summer of 1901 that the matter was taken up in a more serious spirit by three or four Scottish members of Parliament interested in Art, to one of whom the position had been explained a few months earlier by a member of the Academy¹ This group of men, who knew their subject, were not to be set aside by the plausible statements of Treasury officials ; and when in June, 1901, the grants for Art were under consideration the case for the Scottish National Gallery was so ably advocated by Sir John Stirling-Maxwell and others that, in the division which followed, a large number of members of both political parties voted for the reduction of the estimates. Encouraged by the measure of success which had attended their efforts, and the attention the debate had drawn to the subject, the leaders in the attack, now in co-operation with several others as ardent as themselves, determined to see the thing through, and, with increased knowledge of the cause they were advocating gained in the interval, they brought up the matter again in the ensuing session. It was during this second debate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, in a speech which did little credit either to his taste in Art or to his knowledge of the subject under consideration—sorely pressed, and evidently somewhat bewildered with the complexities of the situation—declared that no grant could be made until some clearer knowledge was forthcoming concerning this “Board of Manufactures” and its relationships with Scottish art. He promised at the same time to ask the Secretary for Scotland, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, to appoint a commission to inquire into the subject. Nothing more fortunate could have happened, and it was felt by all who had the matter at heart that their point was gained. But no one then foresaw the scope of the changes the inquiry was to bring about.

The “Departmental Committee to inquire into Administration of the Board of Manufactures” was appointed early in September. It consisted of—

The Right Hon. Aretas Akers-Douglas, M.P. (now Lord Chilston), Secretary of State for the Home Department, Chairman ;

Sir John Stirling-Maxwell, Baronet, M.P. ;

Sir Walter Armstrong, B.A., Director of the National Gallery of Ireland ;

Sir Kenneth John MacKenzie, Baronet, King’s and Lord Treasurer’s
Remembrancer ;

Thomas Ryburn Buchanan, Esq. ;

Ewan Macpherson, Esq., Advocate, was nominated Secretary to the Committee.

North-West Lanark ; Sir Thomas D. Gibson-Carmichael, Bart., Midlothian ; and Ronald C. Munro-Ferguson, Esq., Leith Burghs, were the first to take Parliamentary action at this time.

The Committee commenced their sittings at the Royal Institution on Wednesday, October 1st, 1902, and took evidence during four consecutive days from selected witnesses representing different bodies interested. A month later two additional sittings were held in London, where further evidence was taken. As no fewer than eight bodies might be directly affected by any disturbance of the status quo, and as one or two of these were represented by several witnesses, the evidence taken during the six days' sittings was voluminous, occupying 115 pages of a Parliamentary Blue-Book. The Institutions referred to were—

The Board of Manufactures ;	The Royal Society ;
The National Gallery ;	The Society of Antiquaries ;
The National Portrait Gallery ;	The Trustees' Art School ;
The Royal Scottish Academy ;	The School of Applied Art.

One might add to these the Society of Scottish Artists, though, as accommodation for their Exhibitions was optional to the Board, they had not the same standing as the others, all of whom had a good right of tenure in the Mound buildings or in that recently erected in Queen Street. One or two other bodies, as being interested in a more remote way, were represented before the Committee ; and the inclusion amongst these of the South of Scotland Chamber of Commerce would not help to dispel the suspicion that the noblemen and gentlemen of the Board were in some way or other associated with manufacturers.

By this time it had become apparent to all acquainted with the art situation in the north that the question had travelled far beyond the mere claim for an annual grant of £1,000 to the Scottish National Gallery, and the Report issued on the 10th August, 1903, shows that the gentlemen of the Committee had realised this to the full. The task they had set them was no light one : it involved the unravelling and adjusting the confusions and anomalies of nearly two centuries. The Equivalent Grant made to Scotland at the Union was in lieu of certain obligations undertaken in connexion with English debts contracted before that period. Twenty years later what remained of the original sum of about £400,000, commuted to an annual payment of £2,000, with the interest of a further sum of £20,000, was placed under the charge of a Board of Trustees to be used for the encouragement of the woollen, hempen, and linen industries throughout Scotland, and of the herring fishery on its coasts. The noblemen and gentlemen successively appointed as Trustees came to be known as the Board of Manufactures. But from the beginning of the nineteenth century, and more markedly with each succeeding decade, the title was a misnomer. Manufactures and industries no longer requiring artificial support, the Trustees had, through the increasing reputation and widened scope of their School of Design, become best known by their activities in this sphere, so that when, later, the movements for extended facilities for Art training, and the establishment of National Galleries were in the air, and when the wants of the sister kingdoms were being met out of the Imperial funds, in Scotland there were always these revenues and accumulations of revenue arising out of the old Equivalent Grant—already in part devoted to Art purposes—to have recourse to. And the central authorities were not loth to make use of them; for, in spite of their protests, the Board's funds had been largely drawn on both for the National and National Portrait Galleries. Whilst recognising their obligations in regard to Art education, with the building and upkeep of National Galleries, the Trustees contended, they had nothing to do. Their protests had been brushed aside, and, as the annual £2,000 had, by an Act passed in 1854, been transferred from the Consolidated Fund to the administration of Parliament, it was made to appear in the estimates as Imperial money, and it was quite impossible to have the matter cleared up in a Parliamentary debate. A Commission of Inquiry was long overdue, and, whatever the intention, both the Artists and the Art public of Scotland are indebted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer who suggested it, and to Lord Balfour of Burleigh for the very capable men nominated to carry it through.

The Committee's Report recommended extensive changes; amongst others—that the Board of Manufactures be reconstituted under the name of Board of Trustees for the National Galleries of Scotland: that they should exercise a general supervision over and ultimate control of the National and National Portrait Galleries, having the management of the old Board's accumulated funds and revenues for administration in the interests of Scottish art: that a new building be erected for the National Gallery, and that its constitution be assimilated to those of London and Dublin, with provisions for grants in aid and salaries on a suitable scale: that the whole building jointly occupied by the National Gallery and the Academy be handed over to the latter, the Academy in return to convey to the nation the whole of their works of art lent to the National and National Portrait Galleries : that a new Art School, on modern lines, be established for Edinburgh.

After due consideration a Bill dealing with the subject was brought in by the Unionist Government. Unfortunately, through some technical flaw or blunder it had to be withdrawn, and before it could be reintroduced a General Election had placed the opposite party in power. The result was that more than three years elapsed between the issue of the Report and the passing of the Act by which the Committee's recommendations—with some important modifications, as it turned out—were given effect to. In the meantime a glance may be taken of the Academy's doings in the interval.

Sir James Guthrie, on whom the honour of knighthood had been conferred during an official visit of the King and Queen to Edinburgh in the spring of 1903, was the youngest, and has certainly proved himself the most energetic of those called to preside over the Academy's affairs. The Exhibition receipts, which had fluctuated considerably during the earlier years of Sir George Reid's term of office, had towards its close been again on the down-grade. To meet this state of affairs expenditure had been cut down as far as possible, the opening banquet had been discontinued, and the borrowing of important pictures from the South, which had been a feature of the annual Exhibitions since their institution, had been considerably reduced. All this was changed on the advent of the younger President. The banquets were resumed, and within a few years of his taking office two important Memorial collections were shown, the first, of the work of Mr. J. M'Neill Whistler, an Honorary Member, in connexion with the annual Exhibition of 1904; the other of that of Mr. G. F. Watts, during the later months of the following year. Also through Sir James Guthrie's exertions and the courtesy of the National Art Collections Fund Committee the famous "Rokeby Venus," recently purchased for the London National Gallery, was placed for a fortnight in the Exhibition of 1906. The new policy had a wonderful effect in drawing the public, and, especially when the great Velasquez was on view, the crowded state of the rooms recalled to older members the attendances of the sixties and seventies. The inclusion of a veritable old master in the annual Exhibition was not quite unprecedented, though it hadn't occurred since Rubens' "Adoration of the Shepherds" was dropped through the removed cupola of the Waterloo Place rooms in 1829.¹

But another of Sir George Reid's reforms, the curtailment of the number of works admitted, was rigidly adhered to, the contributions of members and non-members alike being restricted to three works. As regards the character of these later Exhibitions, it may be said that most of the modern movements—with the exception of the extreme eccentrics—were represented more or less fully. The old order was changing, "yielding place to new," as is inevitable in all things human. Within a few years of the opening of the century Sir Noël Paton, John Faed, Erskine Nicol and James Archer, whose works had contributed so much to the success of the Exhibitions of Watson Gordon and Harvey's days, had died, one verging on, the others over the four score. At the other end of the scale the Academy was the poorer from the loss of two of their most virile representatives of a later technique, Arthur Melville and Robert Brough.¹ A few years later, the President and Council had the pleasure of congratulating two members, Mr. William M'Taggart and Mr. Hugh Cameron, on the jubilee of their association with the Academy.

As already indicated, the National Galleries Act did not altogether follow the recommendations made in the Committee's Report. The provision of a new National Gallery had proved too difficult an item. In the interval several sites had been suggested and sketch-plans had been prepared by some of the architect members of the Academy, but Government were unwilling to consider even the least costly of them. They were able, besides, to point to vehement protests from the citizens against any attempt to remove the Gallery from the central and easily accessible position it occupied; and though many who supported the protests hadn't darkened the doors of the Gallery for years, and in spite of the fact that the site is admittedly far from an ideal one for a permanent collection of works of art,² the suggested change had to be abandoned. That being so, the congestion at the Mound had to be met otherwise. The Act met it by assigning the whole of the southmost building to the National Gallery, and the Royal

² The Earthen Mound, to give it the name by which it was first known, on which the National Gallery stands, is pierced, at a few yards under the flooring, by the tunnels of the N.B. Railway, so that the pictures are subjected to incessant vibration from passing trains, not to mention the smoke inseparable from the immediate vicinity of a great central station.

Institution, reconstructed internally to suit it for their purpose, to the Academy.¹ Suitable accommodation was to be found elsewhere for the Royal Society; offices were provided for the new Board of Trustees at the National Portrait Gallery; while the art training which had been so long carried on at the Royal Institution was to be incorporated with a new Art School to be established on modern lines, as suggested in the Committee's Report. Though the changes were not exactly what had been recommended, the Act left none of the institutions located at the Mound unaffected.

The early carrying through of the changes indicated above hinged on the prompt provision of new premises for the bodies occupying the Royal Institution building, especially for the Board's School, with which that of Applied Art had recently been affiliated. Fortunately, the recommendation of the Departmental Committee for the establishment of a new Art School had been well received. The Municipality had taken the matter up, and with the goodwill and substantial assistance of the Scotch Education Department, supplemented by public contributions, and the never-failing subsidy from the Board's accumulated funds, the foundation of the structure in which the higher art training of the city is now co-ordinated was laid in July, 1907. By its opening in January, 1909, and the installation of the Royal Society in George Street about the same time, the way was cleared for the reconstruction of the Academy's future home. Here all had not gone quite smoothly; constant vigilance and the utmost tact on the part of the President and the Academy's law agent, Mr. Garson, had been necessary to avoid the dangers which threatened from time to time. On one occasion, within a few days of the passing of the Act, there seemed to be a deadlock. The terms on which the Academy had given up the galleries they had occupied since 1855 for the purposes of the National Collection were that the building assigned to them was to be made suitable for their purpose. The estimated cost of carrying out the reconstruction on the lines agreed on—which had been suggested to the architect by Sir James Guthrie—was £14,000, and that sum had been sanctioned by the Treasury. But subsequently it was found that the nature of the foundations and a revised estimate for heating and lighting would entail an additional cost of some £6,000, and this the Treasury absolutely refused to agree to. There seemed no way out of the difficulty ; the estimates had to be passed within a few days, and the matter seemed in a fair way of drifting into another year, when, at Sir James Guthrie's earnest request, a meeting of Scottish members and others interested was got together, and the situation was again put before the Treasury in all its bearings. The guardians of the public purse based their case on the sum which had been named in the first estimates, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Lloyd George, who gave the final ruling, pointed out that the Academy had no responsibility for the sum named, the agreement with them being that the place was to be reconstructed on plans agreed on. "A bargain's a bargain, gentlemen. We'll have to find the money for it," were the words with which he is said to have closed the argument. Some compromise had to be made, but the final result was that, at a cost approaching £20,000, the building erected by their old rivals of the Institution, and in one or two of the galleries of which the Academy had held their Exhibitions for about twenty years, was, after the lapse of more than half a century, made over to them, bearing their own name, in April, 1911. For valuable services in the framing and carrying through of the various provisions of the Bill, the Academy and all interested in Scottish Art are deeply indebted to Lord Dunedin, Lord Linlithgow, and Lord Pentland, who successively held the position of Secretary of State for Scotland ; and in addition to those already mentioned who had led the movement in the House of Commons in 1901, to Lord Balcarras, Sir George Younger, and the Hon. Thomas Cochrane, Unionists ; and to Mr. Eugene Wason, P.C., and Mr. J. W. Gulland, Liberals. For it was only through the united front shown by those political opponents, and the support given by the Scottish members on both sides of the House, that the many difficulties of the situation were surmounted.

The reconstruction of the building, which involved great difficulties, was carried out by Mr. W. T. Oldrieve, His Majesty's Principal Architect for Scotland, to the entire satisfaction of the President and Council, and of the Committee co-operating with them. The structure, which had been showing signs of instability, was, by means of modern appliances, set firmly on its foundations ; and, though the line-space obtained was less than would have been available had the recommendations of the Committee been carried out, the ingenious device of making the main galleries run crosswise insured a sufficiency of wall-space to meet the wants of Scottish artists for many years to come.

Also, by the insertion of a new flooring over the whole extent of the building, whilst the galleries above were left of quite a sufficient height, ample accommodation was found on the ground floor for the Academy's offices, their library and private apartments. A feature of the new suite of galleries was the Sculpture Hall, running the full breadth of the building from east to west, and at length providing what had been wanting in the Academy's former homes, an ideal setting for the exhibition of works in that department.

The Academy, as officially representing Art in Scotland, had been given a leading place on the Managing Board of the new Art College, and, as arising out of that, and of the advantages which would attend the complete co-ordination of the higher art training for Edinburgh and the east of Scotland in one central institution, the Life Classes which had been carried on by the Academy for three-quarters of a century—always under hampering conditions—found ampler accommodation at Lauriston Place. The transfer, owing to charter obligations, was not unattended with difficulties, but after some friendly negotiations an arrangement was come to by which, under the name of the Royal Scottish Academy's School of Painting, the classes are carried on under the management of a Committee of eight, four of whom, who also act as visitors, are elected by the Academy and four by the Managing Board of the College. In 1903 the prize list had been enriched by the establishment, through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Carnegie of Skibo, of the travelling scholarship known by their name. This enabled the Council, with the assistance of the visitors, to award annually one or two scholarships to students who have completed their curriculum, for the purpose of continuing their studies abroad. Thus was made permanent a privilege the Academy had been able to accord only occasionally to promising pupils of former years; and a Carnegie Scholarship is now the highest ambition of the more advanced students at their School of Painting. Since the institution of the College the membership of the Academy have also been largely represented on the teaching staff of its various departments.

In a preceding paragraph it was stated that the passing of the National Galleries Act left none of the institutions and societies there enumerated unaffected. It may be added that all benefited, some, as the following résumé of its results will show, very materially:

1. The National Gallery now occupies the whole of the building it formerly shared with the Academy, where, through judicious internal alterations, the line-space has been considerably more than doubled. The salaries of the Director—who replaces the former Curator as principal official—and of the Keeper—a newly created office—the emoluments of an enlarged staff of attendants, the upkeep and working expenses of the Gallery on a scale commensurate with those of the sister kingdoms, are defrayed out of Imperial funds, and a sum of £3,000 is annually available for the purchase of works of art, as against practically nothing under the old conditions.

2. At the National Portrait Gallery similar expenses of staff and maintenance, with a grant of £200 a year for additions to the collection, are provided from Imperial sources, whilst the revenue of an endowment fund supplied otherwise raises the amount available for the latter purpose to £800 a year, in place of a miserable former sum of about £30.

The total sum now annually provided by Parliament for the National and National Portrait Galleries is in the neighbourhood of £10,000, as compared with £2,000 formerly; and though the revenue of the old Equivalent Grant and the accumulations therefrom have been freely made use of in providing these and other benefits referred to in this summary, in view of the complexity of the former situation, it is well to know that the £2,000 has been withdrawn from the control of Parliament, and is automatically paid year by year.

3. The Royal Society, which had occupied rooms in the Institution since its erection, at an annual rental of £300, have been provided with premises in George Street, with greatly increased accommodation, rent free. In addition, they enjoy a grant of £600, as against one of half that amount received formerly and paid as rent to the Board of Manufactures.

4. The Higher Art Education given before 1909 in the Trustees' School, the Academy's Life Classes, and at the Heriot-Watt College is now carried on with the financial support of the city in one of the largest and best equipped buildings of its kind in Europe, erected at a cost approaching £90,000, and with a revenue supplied largely through liberal public grants from the Scotch Education Department—of about three times that available in the schools replaced by it. The exceptional conditions under which the Academy's School of Painting is carried on in the new Art College have already been adverted to.

5. The advantages to the Academy from the changes thus brought about have been fully dwelt on in the course of this narrative.

6. The Society of Antiquaries and the Royal Geographical Society have also benefited incidentally by increased grants from public sources.

The National Galleries Act of 1906, and the circumstances which led on to it, have been dwelt on in some detail because of the intimate relationships which, since its establishment, have existed between the Gallery and the Academy—relationships which have no parallel in the sister countries—and because, as regards the Act itself, the initiative may fairly be said to have come from the Academy. Its scope has far exceeded the intention of that initiative, and in some directions the extensions were not unattended with anxiety to those who set things in motion. There were fears that when their galleries were given up for the purposes of the National Collection, Government might not be too generous in providing an equivalent. But by tact and firmness on the part of those acting for the Academy, and a real desire to meet their obligations in a liberal spirit on the part of the Government, the satisfactory arrangement indicated above was arrived at. It is true that to secure this the Academy have gifted to the National Gallery their collection of works of Art, valued at over £30,000, which by the Treasury Minute of 1858 had been placed there on loan;¹ but they believed that in doing so they were acting in the spirit of their predecessors who formed the collection, and who had so readily agreed to its becoming an integral part of the Scottish National Gallery.

Everything possible was done to have the galleries ready for the early spring of 1911. Since their institution the annual exhibitions had opened, with rare exceptions, about the middle of February, but when it became evident that the completion of the numerous details and adjustments incident to reconstruction would involve a postponement of nearly two months, the President and Council resolved to make the approaching exhibition a summer one, and the opening was fixed for the 13th of May. To set against this break with a long tradition, the change of season had some obvious advantages. The evening receipts, which for some years had been suffering specially, might, it was thought, with the advantage of more daylight, be favourably affected. There were also the possibilities incident to the inclusion of the tourist months in the Exhibition season; and though there were some who doubted the expediency of making any permanent change, whatever the result, the majority of the members kept an open mind on the subject.

A few days before the opening, as the outcome of a movement inaugurated amongst the members during the previous year to recognise, in some tangible form, the President's great services in connection with the Academy's establishment in the new building, a mural tablet, bearing a suitable inscription, was unveiled in the members' corridor. At the same time, Sir James was presented with an alto-relievo in bronze, by Alfred Gilbert, R.A.

The policy of showing to the Scottish public representative examples of English and foreign contemporary work in close juxtaposition with that of native artists, was one which had been kept in view in the planning of the new galleries, where, in the various rooms—as in the case of the Sculpture Hall already mentioned—adequate provision was made for doing justice to important works obtained from such sources. It was felt by the President and Council that this policy was called for, not only in recognition of the liberal treatment received by Scottish artists at various continental centres, but as an educative influence, tending, alike in the case of artists and of lay students, to a truer understanding of the work of our time. Fortunately this had been made possible by the establishment, through the exertions of Sir James Guthrie, of an Exhibitions Fund. This fund, amounting to £10,000, which had been contributed readily by a few gentlemen interested in Scottish art, had for one of its objects the borrowing of works suitable for the purpose indicated. Some years previously a drastic change had been made in the election and constitution of the Committee of Arrangement. In place of three members, elected a few weeks before receiving day, with the services of a sculptor for a day or two, the departments of Painting, Sculpture and Architecture had each their sub-committee of three, and they were elected early in the preceding summer. A main part of their duty was to ascertain what notable works might be available for the Exhibition, and to report to the Council through the convener of their section. The practice has been for one or more delegates to visit London and some continental centre, and to submit a list of representative works selected by them for invitation. Official invitations are then issued to the artists by the President and Council. The expenses of the delegates, and those attending the collection, insurance and forwarding of such works as may have been promised, are paid out of the revenue of the Exhibitions Fund.

These additional elements gave special interest to the public opening of the galleries. This was preceded by a banquet, on the evening of May 12th, at which Lord Pentland, Secretary of State for Scotland, and many other distinguished guests were present. In proposing the toast of the Royal Scottish Academy Lord Pentland gave a brief sketch of the movement which had resulted in a new departure in the art world of Scotland, and the President in replying expressed the Academy's deep indebtedness to his Lordship and other Scottish Secretaries for the part they had taken in the difficult and delicate negotiations with Government and with the Treasury. The Exhibition was a successful one in every respect. Members and Honorary Members were well represented, whilst, in its various sections, representative works from abroad had been secured through the exertions of the delegates of the Committees of Arrangement. A large increase in the attendance seemed to justify the change in the date of opening, and though a first year's experience could hardly be accepted as conclusive, the result was sufficiently satisfactory—especially in regard to the evening receipts, which were almost doubled—to determine the Council to give the summer opening a further trial.

During the month of July Their Majesties, the King and Queen, on the occasion of their first official visit to Scotland, honoured the Academy by visiting the galleries, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Mary, the Duke of Connaught and a numerous suite. The Royal party were received in front of the Academy by Sir James Guthrie, who conducted them to the Exhibition rooms, where the members of Council, the Academicians, the Associates, and a few other gentlemen prominently connected with Scottish art were in attendance. Their Majesties commented favourably on many of the works exhibited, both native and foreign, and expressed themselves much gratified with their visit. Before leaving, Their Majesties and the other members of the Royal party signed their names in the visitors' book.

In this survey of the origin and development of an institution which—including the earlier exhibiting societies from which it arose—is almost coeval with a distinctively Scottish art, an endeavour has been made to vary the monotony of official records by glimpses of the art and the art life of Scotland and its capital, as seen in the character of its Exhibitions or described by contemporary writers. Until towards the close of the eighteenth century the works of Scottish painters, whether resident in Rome, London, or Edinburgh, had been a mere echo of the conventional European art of which Battoni and Raphael Mengs were the high priests. But from about 1780 Raeburn's virile portraiture and David Allan's illustrations of Scottish song and ballad inaugurated a new order of things, and when the first Exhibiting Society was formed in 1808, the Agrippinas and Lucretias of Alexander Runciman and Gavin Hamilton were already a tradition. The breath of a new life was in the air, and the hundred years' Exhibitions embraced in this narrative give evidence of an art quick to respond—and always with a native flavour—to the wider influences which have directed the course of the Fine Arts during a period of ever-accelerating change. And though the writer has no wish to identify the story of the Academy with the history of Scottish art—for during the last half-century at least other societies have shared in its development amongst us—it may fairly be said that better than some older and more widely known institutions of a like nature in other countries, the Scottish Academy have justified the position assigned them by the powers that be as official representatives of the Fine Arts. Charges of exclusiveness, or of setting up an Academic type of art to which all who would share in their favours must conform, cannot be brought against them, as has been freely done in the case of some more illustrious bodies, for they have voluntarily abolished the limit to membership, and their Exhibitions have been freely open to all reasonable developments of the arts they represent. What the national collection has owed to the Academy both at its establishment in 1858, and again quite recently, has been told in the preceding pages. It is not contended that during their ninety years of chequered existence the Academy have always been guided by the dictates of the highest wisdom, or that they have always done the right thing just at the right time. More than once, as we have seen, in their contentious early years, they were rescued from difficult positions by the intervention of well-wishers from without; but it may surely be claimed that, through prosperous times and times not so prosperous, they have strenuously championed the development of a native and individual school, and that to the many eminent men who have presided over its councils or guided its affairs Scotland is mainly indebted for the place she now holds in the field of European art.

Works by Academicians Associates and
Hon. Members of

The Royal Scottish Academy

and by Sir Henry Raeburn exhibited between 1808 and 1916 : in the exhibitions of the Associated Society of Artists, Edinburgh, 1808-1813, of the Edinburgh Exhibition Society, 1814-1816, of the Royal Institution for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts in Scotland, 1821-1822, and 1824-1830, and of the Royal Scottish Academy, 1827-1916, specifying works owned by public galleries and institutions in Great Britain and elsewhere, with the date and manner of their acquisition.

NOTES

IN addition to the ninety annual exhibitions, five special exhibitions have been held by the Royal Scottish Academy. The year-dates in heavy type designate these exhibitions:

1831 = Eight works by William Etty, including the five Judith and Holofernes pictures, and Twenty-seven Diploma Works. Opened December.

1863 = Works by Deceased and Living Scottish Artists. October to November.

1880 = Works by Deceased and Living Scottish Artists. October to December.

1885 = Works in Water-colour and Sculptures by Living Artists. July to October.

1887 = Works in Water-colour and Sculptures by Living Artists. July to October.

Consistent with needs of identification, many titles, especially of works in early exhibitions, have been abbreviated. Poetical quotations appear only where works are not otherwise entitled.

In common with all other exhibition catalogues those of the Royal Scottish Academy are not free from errors. Some of these doubtless have remained undetected by the compiler.

It has been found impracticable to obtain the birth and death dates of a few artists.

While every effort has been made to trace and identify exhibited works now in public galleries, institutions, etc., together with the names of donors or bequeathers, completeness is not claimed; nor even in the prevailing conditions of international communication has completeness been a practicable aim. In the case of such works lent to the exhibitions, the name of the lender appears in the entry after the bracketed information, e.g. (p. 20):

1880 237 John Stuart Blackie (Vide 1876, No. 255). (R.S.A. Collection. Presented by Artist on death of sitter in 1895, as arranged between them in 1884.)
Lent by Professor Blackie.

Index I. contains information not appearing in the entries regarding some lenders, donors, and bequeathers.

The compiler desires to express his cordial thanks to Mr. James L. Caw, Director of the National Galleries of Scotland, for assistance generously given; to Mr. A. H. Millar, LL.D., of the Dundee Gallery; to Mr. Harry Townend, of the Aberdeen Gallery; to Mr. E. Rimbault Dibdin, of the Liverpool Gallery; to Mr. Thomas Rennie, of the Glasgow Gallery; and to other Directors and Curators of Art galleries in Great Britain and Overseas whose help has been indispensable.

MEMES, Dr. (of Ayr)

Painter

Hon. Member 1833.

(Probably John S. Memes, A.M., author of 'Memoir of Canova,' 1825, and 'Life of Cowper,' 1834. In 1824, when he was 28, John S. Memes was a candidate for the office of Rector of the Edinburgh Academy. The British Museum copy of his printed letter addressed to the Directors bears the following MS. note by Lord H. Cockburn: 'All the other candidates, being about 90 in number, have left their merits to be stated by their friends; but this person chuses to state his own. This address is a sufficient evidence [independantly of the satin neckcloth] of his being a most conceited, shallow fool. Clear against him.')

'His Majesty's First Limner and Painter in Scotland,' 1823.

President of Associated Society of Artists, 1812-13; of the Edinburgh Exhibition Society, 1813-16.

Though Sir Henry Raeburn died three years before the Scottish Academy was founded, his predominant position in the development of Scottish Art renders appropriate the inclusion of a list of his works exhibited by the Associated Society of Artists, by the Institution, and, after his death, by the Royal Scottish Academy. The memorable exhibition of 325 pictures by Raeburn, held in the R.S.A. Galleries in 1876, was not organised by the R.S.A.
